Senator Barack Obama is commanding headlines this week from Baghdad to Berlin. But the central front in his war for the White House with Senator John McCain remains communities back home like Warren, Mich.; Columbus, Ohio; and Wilkes-Barre, Pa. If Mr. Obama faces a challenge in narrowing Mr. McCain's advantage on national security, the struggling economy offers the Democratic candidate an opportunity for building his own edge. The ill-timed remarks of Mr. McCain's adviser Phil Gramm, who resigned after he derided "a nation of whiners" about the economy, only compounded Republican fears about job losses and market turmoil on President Bush's watch.

McCain and Obama Agree to Attend Megachurch Forum (NYT 7/21/08)

It has taken a man of God, perhaps, to do what nobody else has been able to do since the general election season began: Get Barack Obama and John McCain together on the same stage before their party conventions later this summer. The Rev. Rick Warren has persuaded the candidates to attend a forum at his Saddleback Church, in Lake Forest, Calif., on Aug. 16.

McCain arrives in Maine, will attend events today (Portland Press Herald 7/21/08)
By ELBERT AULL
Republican presidential hopeful Sen. John McCain arrived in Portland late Sunday afternoon in advance of what is shaping up to be a day of debate on energy and the economy. McCain is due to attend private fundraisers this morning in Kennebunkport – one at the Bush family compound at Walker's Point – and make a public appearance at the Maine Military Museum in South Portland this afternoon. Democrats and antiwar activists have planned two events to coincide with McCain's stops in southern Maine, an effort to tie the Arizona senator to an unpopular Bush administration.

McCain caught in crossfire over U.S. troops' status (USA Today 7/20/08)
By David Jackson
Republican John McCain's campaign jousted Sunday with two prominent politicians over when and how to pull troops out of Iraq: Barack Obama and Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki. In an interview published over the weekend in a German magazine, al-Maliki seemed to endorse Obama's short-term plan to pull out U.S. troops over 16 months. However, an al-Maliki spokesman seemed to back away from those comments in a statement released Sunday.

One simple way to predict a victor (Financial Times 7/20/08)

One cannot help but be struck by the current disconnection in US presidential politics between, on one hand, the excitement and enthusiasm that attend Barack Obama's candidacy and, on the other, the tightness of the race according to recent polls. The first suggests a sweeping victory for the Democrat in November, the second a close election and the distinct possibility of a win for John McCain.

500 Religious Leaders Against Hagee (Huffington Post 7/20/08)
By Rabbi Haim Dov Beliak and Rev. John Hubers
... What is most troubling is the political access Pastor Hagee has, with politicians in Israel and the United States wittingly or unwittingly giving credence to what is best described as a militant apocalyptic theo-political ideology. Senator McCain belatedly realized how toxic Hagee's views are, disassociating his presidential campaign from Hagee's embrace. Several politicians who will be appearing on stage with Pastor Hagee in next week's CUFI summit in Washington DC apparently haven't gotten the message yet.

For better or worse, McCain wedded to town halls (AP 7/19/08)

John McCain was in his favorite campaign setting, a town hall meeting, when he spotted a promising target. Call it a soft launch. Friday afternoons in the dead heart of summer are not exactly when you make a splash in the news cycle. But this is when the McCain campaign chose to pull the trigger on its latest television ad, the harshest of the general election so far. It represents the beginnings of an evolution from the old McCain attack theme--"typical politics" ...--to something that frames the campaign around questions of Obama's experience and judgement. More of this is coming down the pike.

In Iraq, and Under the Spotlight (Washington Post 7/21/08)

Looking back over the last 40 years, the presidential campaign that most closely resembles this year's is the contest between Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter in 1976. DMR : Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience

If there's one thing Democrats and Republicans agree on this year, it's the fact that the next president will face enormous challenges.

Domestically, this president must work with Congress in confronting the issues of immigration, health care, increased threats to national security, the disappearing middle class, the growing deficit, Social Security solvency, gun control, renewable energy, sentencing reform and more.

On the world stage, this president will have to work with foreign leaders in dealing with ISIS and other terrorists, climate change, the containment of nuclear threats posed in North Korea and Iran, the Russian incursions in Ukraine and foreign trade.

The presidency is not an entry-level position. Whoever is sworn into office next January must demonstrate not only a deep understanding of the issues facing America, but also possess the diplomatic skills that enable presidents to forge alliances to get things done.

By that measure, Democrats have one outstanding candidate deserving of their support: Hillary Clinton. No other candidate can match the depth or breadth of her knowledge and experience.

As first lady, she worked tirelessly on health care reform and, with bipartisan support, created the Children's Health Insurance Programthat provides coverage for 8 million children.

As a senator, she reached across party lines and joined forces with conservatives, including Sen. Lindsey Graham and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, to fight for job creation and universal health care.

ENDORSEMENT: Marco Rubio can chart new direction for GOP

NASH: Register faced tough decision in endorsements

RELATED:A history of Register caucus endorsements

As secretary of state, she helped secure international sanctions against Iran and redefined her job by expanding America's diplomatic agenda to include poverty, women's rights, the environment and other issues.

She is not a perfect candidate, as evidenced the way she has handled the furor over her private email server. In our endorsement of her 2008 campaign for president, we wrote that "when she makes a mistake, she should just say so." That appears to be a lesson she has yet to fully embrace.

Her changing stance on gay marriage, immigration and other issues has invited accusations that she is guided less by personal conviction than by political calculations. She refutes that, and argues persuasively that a willingness to change one's thinking on specific issues, while remaining true to what she calls "the same values and principles," is a virtue, one lacking in most politicians.

Over the course of two meetings, Clinton spent more than three hours with the editorial board, answering questions in a direct and forthright manner. She exhibited an impressive command of the issues, though we'd have liked to hear more fromher on the debt and the future of Social Security. She was somewhat prickly and defensive when discussing her emails, but overall she was gracious, engaging and personable.

Her chief opponent for the nomination, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has proven to be an honorable and formidable campaigner, and it's very likely that without him in the race, candidates in both parties wouldn't be discussing America's growing inequality in wealth and income.

Sanders has tapped into the public's anger and frustration with Washington, without demonizing government and resorting to the cheap demagoguery favored by Donald Trump and others. He has shown himself to be a man of courage and principle who has the ability to rally others to his cause.

But Sanders admits that virtually all of his plans for reform have no chance of being approved by a Congress that bears any resemblance to the current crop of federal lawmakers. This is why, he says, voters can't simply elect him president, but must instead spark a "political revolution."

Easier said than done. Congress has the largest Republican majority since the 71st Congress of 1929-31.

A successful Sanders presidency would hinge on his ability to remake Washington in his own image. It's almost inconceivable that such a transformation could take place, even with Democrats controlling both chambers of Congress.

As for Martin O'Malley, the data-driven, wonkish former Maryland governor who has gained little traction in the campaign so far, he seems better suited to a Cabinet-level job in a Clinton White House.

In the final analysis, Iowa Democrats will have to choose between the lofty idealism of Bernie Sanders and the down-to-earth pragmatism of Hillary Clinton. For some, this will be a choice of whether to vote with their hearts or their heads.

Clinton has demonstrated that she is a thoughtful, hardworking public servant who has earned the respect of leaders at home and abroad. She stands ready to take on the most demanding job in the world.

Subject: Thoughts on Israel and Iran from Tom Donilon and Dennis Ross

Dear Jake,

I attended a book launch at the Washington Institute today for Dennis Ross' new book "Doomed to Success". He and Tom Donilon held a discussion and there were several points you may wish to consider for Hillary's use.

1. Israel is most likely to show flexibility when it has confidence in the US, and when there is the intense security dialogue that existed when Tom was NSC adviser, but does not exist now. (Dennis). This should include an updated security MOU(Dennis and Tom)

2.The US needs to engage in confidence boosting measures with Israel and the Palestinians, and should not be paralyzed into inaction because a comprehensive peace is not possible now. It must not be seen as a binary choice between all or nothing, or a dangerous vacuum will be created. These practical steps include the following:

(1) Stating and restating the status quo Kerry brokered with Israel and Jordan, with 24/7 cameras, for the Temple Mount.
(2) Lowering provocative rhetoric on both sides, and encouraging the Palestinians to speak out against violence.
(3) Restore a belief in a two-state soluton as the only alternative. The Oslo Agreement is still the framework, and although Abbas says he is no longer bound by it, actual security cooperation and tax revenue transfers continue.
(4) Given the weakness and dysfunction of the Palestinian leadership, quietly encourage the moderate Arabs to support their re-entry into negotiations.(Dennis)

I could add to that economic initiatives (QIZ in the West Bank; joint projects in the West Bank; reduced checkpoints and increased numbers of carefully vetted Palestinian workers, etc.)

3. Iran (Dennis and Tom). At the November 9 meeting between Bibi and Obama, and the Washington meetings Bibi will hold, the following should be accomplished:

(1) There must be a fact-based analysis of Iranian compliance with the deal. (Tom) A joint consultative group of senior intelligence experts should be created with Israel and the US to monitor Iranian compliance with the nuclear deal, and determine how violations will be handled. This can rebuild trust between the two governments, and avoid differing interpretations.(Dennis)
(2) The US should make clear in advance the consequences of Iranian violations during the 10-15 year period, and thereafter, what the US would do if Iran tries a nuclear weapons breakout.

4. Israel.

(1) The PM needs to repair the damage to Israel's bipartisan support, by time and again stressing that US support for Israel has always been and must remain outside partisan politics. The two countries have shared values and interests (Tom)
(2) Both agreed that Obama made a serious error at the outset of his Administration of going to Cairo and not going to Israel afterward.
(3) The violence is very different than the 1st and 2d Intifadas, which were centrally directed. But their randomness also makes it more difficult to stop.(Dennis).
(4) The violence underscores the fantasy and danger of a one state solution, since it would incorporate violent elements into Israel.(Dennis)

5. Syria.(Tom).

(1) Russia's re-entry into the Middle East for the first time since the 1970s is a dangerous situation, both with the possibility of military encounters with the US, but also because of the foothold it gives Russia.
(2) This is also dangerous for Israel as it puts Assad's allies, Hezbollah and Iran, near the Golon Heights
(3)(Dennis) Victories in northern Iraq against ISIS are very important to dent their image of invulnerability, which is a major recruiting tool for them.

Best wishes,

John,
As I mentioned, as a second-generation (parents came here in '56) Hungarian-American, I'd love to do surrogate work for HRC with the ethnic Eastern European communities, in addition to the foreign policy work with Jake and Laura.

Let me know what I need to do to get it going. As of now I have trips planned to give lectures in the spring in Newport, RI and Seattle and London next week (I did participate in a Munich fundraiser with Melanne V. the week before last and could do something like that again.) I also do a lot of media, mainly right now on Russia and the Middle East -- Amanpour probably next Monday, BBC radio tomorrow am.

Attached is more info about me than you could ever need! - Evelyn

George Soros recently mentioned to me that he had encountered someone in Seattle who would be interested in support for AMI. Attached, is some information on that person, Rob Glaser, that was sent to me by George's aide, Michael Vachon. As I don't know Glaser, and Michael says "he seemed to know Podesta," I forward what I got from Michael so you can consider how to proceed with him.

Aryeh, The tycoon in question is Rob Glaser. He is indeed the founder and CEO of RealNetworks (market cap. $670 million). He and George met for about half an hour. His contact information is below, along with information about this foundation. In addition to AMI, George also thought Glaser might be interested in MDLF. As it turns out he knows Veran Matic and had somehow helped B92 transmit over the Internet when they needed to do that. I gave Glaser's contact information to Harlan and Sasa and sent Glaser information on their group. You might also want to know that Glaser is a college friend of Mort Halperin's son. In a follow up note I sent to Glaser, I gave him Mort's contact information and indicated that Mort was the AMI contact, this is what George had asked me to do. I do not know if they've been in touch. I myself did not hear anything back from Glaser. Finally, I got the impression that Glaser was fairly well connected in mainstream democratic circles, I believe he is involved or was in discussions with Gore on some project and he seemed to know Podesta. Hope this is helpful. Let me know if you want more info on Glaser or the brief meeting.

On the Glaser Foundation: By focusing on three complementary program areas -- Measuring Progress, Animal Advocacy and Independent Media -- The Glaser Progress Foundation aims to build a more just, sustainable and humane world. The Foundation was inspired, endowed and is led by Rob Glaser, CEO of RealNetworks, Inc., the company that pioneered the delivery of audio and video content over the Internet. Since its creation in 1993, the Glaser Progress Foundation has distributed over 11 million dollars for philanthropic purposes. The Foundation is located in Seattle with a staff of three: Executive Director Martin Collier <mailto:martin@glaserprogress.org> , Program Officer Mitchell Fox <mailto:mitchell@glaserprogress.org> , and Operations Director Leslie McDonald <mailto:leslie@glaserprogress.org> . Unsolicited Application Letters are accepted throughout the year for projects that fit the Foundation's funding areas; as well, the Foundation approaches organizations seeking potential partners for Foundation Program Initiatives.

BuzzFeed: "DREAMer Activists Plan To Keep Confronting Hillary Clinton On Immigration"

By Adrian Carrasquillo and Ruby Cramer

September 19, 2014, 9:41 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Another disturbance is planned Friday at the DNC Women's Leadership Forum where Clinton will speak, making it the third time in a week that DREAMers will make their presence felt at one of her events.

On the rope line at an event in Iowa last Sunday, three undocumented activists waited to ask Hillary Clinton about the delay of executive actions on immigration. Clinton flashed the group a thumbs up. But when the activists pressed her on the question, Clinton said, "I think we have to elect more Democrats," then kept moving.

Two days later, at a benefit in New York featuring Clinton, about six immigration activists interrupted the event, chanting "Undocumented, Unafraid!" Security removed the protesters. Afterward, Clinton took photos with fans and ignored questions from a reporter about the incident.

A group of activists have another confrontation planned for Friday morning.

The cadre of so-called DREAMers — undocumented youth brought to the country as children — will protest outside the Women's Leadership Forum, an event hosted by the Democratic National Committee, where Clinton is booked to speak.

The encounter was organized by the group, United We Dream. It will be the third time in one week that Clinton has had to deal with disruptions from activists on immigration.

High-profile DREAMer activists and immigration groups say there is no coordinated campaign against Clinton. But the activists who plan these actions identified the former secretary of state, who is expected to run for president again, as a central target of run-ins like the ones in Iowa and New York.

Clinton, they said, can expect continued questions at her public appearances about President Obama's delay until after the midterm elections of expected executive actions that would ease deportations — an announcement that riled the activist community earlier this month.

"One of the targets in the long run is going to be Hillary," said Erika Andiola, a national activist among DREAMers who filmed the confrontation in Iowa last weekend. Andiola posted the video on YouTube, and news outlets picked up the story hours later.

"She's Hillary Clinton, not just any old person," said Julieta Garibay, a United We Dream leader. "Right now for us, anyone who is standing in the way of justice for our families is against us. We wouldn't call her the primary target, but with the voice she has, we're frustrated with anyone who says there should be a delay or that there shouldn't be action."

Andiola, who runs the Arizona-based Dream Action Coalition, said plans to confront Clinton and other lawmakers over immigration are loosely organized, passed on by word of mouth inside the tight network of activists and undocumented youth.

What exactly the activists want to hear from Clinton is somewhat unclear: They said they don't expect deep policy comments from Clinton immigration at these events. But, the activists said, they do want more than the paltry lines she gave in between autographs last weekend in Iowa.

"We want to hear, 'I support DREAMers, I support families,'" said Cesar Vargas, who heads Dream Action Coalition with Andiola.

A Clinton spokesperson did not respond to a request for comment on the DREAMers.

But Adrienne Elrod, a spokesperson for Correct the Record, the research project aimed at defending Clinton, highlighted the former senator's past efforts on immigration and what she described as a lifetime endeavor to "help families and our nation's immigrants be able to earn and live the American Dream."

"In the Senate, she co-sponsored the DREAM Act on several occasions, consistently voted in favor of comprehensive immigration reform and introduced legislation to reunite families separated by the immigration system," Elrod said.

Clinton has been approached by activists on this issue before. In April, at a Clinton Foundation event in Manhattan, a 19-year-old attendee named Nova Bajamonti stood to ask Clinton a question, and tearfully announced "for the first time publicly" that she was an undocumented immigrant. Bajamonti told the story of how she left Croatia for the United States, but was unable to obtain a green card.

Clinton praised Bajamonti as "incredibly brave" and suggested she look into DACA, the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program that allows young people brought to the U.S. as children to obtain legal status.

"I hope you will do that, and if you can't, come talk to us afterward, and we will help you figure that out," Clinton said.

As soon as the event ended, Clinton Foundation staffers found Bajamonti, who was already under DACA at the time. Less than a week later, Bajamonti said this week, the Clinton Foundation connected her with an immigration lawyer to help provide and process her DACA renewal application free of charge.

Vargas and Andiola, along with a 23-year-old undocumented activist named Monica Reyes, also confronted Sen. Bernie Sanders, another Democrat interested in running for president, who appeared at a different event in Iowa last Sunday. The Vermont senator criticized Obama on executive actions — a comment that earned praise from Reyes and other activists.

Andiola and Vargas are also eyeing the governor of Maryland, Martin O'Malley, who has a state record on immigration they love and is considering a run for president.

Their encounter with Clinton in Iowa provoked one Maryland activist to connect Andiola and Vargas with O'Malley, suggesting they find a time to meet, the two activists said.

"O'Malley has clashed with the administration," Vargas said. "He's one of the candidates not taking Latinos for granted."

Clinton, while on tour to promote her new memoir, said in an interview that the unaccompanied children at the border "should be sent back" to their families. The remark caused Fusion's Jorge Ramos, in another interview, to ask Clinton if she had a "Latino problem."

While she walked back her initial comments saying the children should be shown love and only some should be sent back, the questions now put Clinton in a tough spot politically: Dodging young activists on video looks bad, but the prospect of Obama's executive actions, which Democrats in key Senate races opposed before the election, is controversial with some. And while Clinton has critiqued the president on foreign policy since leaving the State Department, she has largely avoided domestic issues.

At the DNC women's forum on Friday, the DREAMers have no plans to infiltrate the event, but will make their presence felt outside the Marriott Marquis hotel. Clinton will be joined by Obama, Vice President Biden, and the chair of the DNC, Rep. Debbie Wasserman Schultz.

Vargas said it's Clinton they'll be watching.

"We want her to show she can be a president. Presidents take leadership when others won't."

CNN opinion: Paul Begala: "Why Hillary Clinton won't say she's running in 2016"

By Paul Begala

September 19, 2014, 9:03 a.m. EDT

"Are you running for president?"

"When will you announce that you're running for president?"

"Why won't you just announce that you're running for president?"

"You wouldn't be have gone to Iowa if you weren't running for president, would you?

Despite the world aflame, Ebola spreading and the Washington Nationals in the playoffs, it seems the only thing the political press can do is speculate about a potential Hillary presidential candidacy.

Keep in mind we are two years and two months away from the next presidential election. And yet the urgency is fierce, bordering on indignation: "Why won't she just tell us if she's running?"

Well, why should she? An announcement now would be stupid, and Hillary is definitely not stupid.

If she were to go Open Kimono on us now it would draw attention from crucial midterm elections, siphon campaign donations from Democrats struggling to hold onto the Senate and possibly even eclipse important debates on how to fight ISIS and whether to shut down the government (again).

There is little such insistence about, say, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie or Indiana Gov. Mike Pence or even two-time loser Mitt Romney. We presume they're running -- just as most folks presume Hillary is. But we're not hectoring them at every turn; we're not resentful that they haven't made a formal announcement.

Probably because we just don't care as much about them. They're not leading in the polls by a million points (nor will Hillary, if and when a campaign is underway), and they simply do not rivet the national attention the way the former first lady, former senator, former secretary of state and future (?!) first female president does.

I have not been in touch with Hillary, so I do not speak with intimate knowledge. But I have known her for -- jeez, 23 years. And I actually believe her when she says she has not completely made up her mind.

Hillary is a wonk who's had to learn the rhythms of campaigning. That's very different from, say, Texas Gov. Rick Perry, a glad-handing natural for whom it can be said that if an idea wanted to cross his mind it would need to bring a canteen. Hillary believes politics should be about ideas -- a clash of visions, of competing plans to promote the general welfare and provide for the common defense.

This, after all, is a woman who rings in each New Year by standing and singing "God Bless America." But there are aspects of campaigning that she loves: a vigorous honest, face-to-face debate; a town hall meeting in which folks ask substantive questions; meeting people who pour their hearts out to her, who hold their baby daughters up to her, who share their hopes and their heartbreaks with her.

So I can imagine that there is an angel on her shoulder whispering, "Who needs it?" Who needs the phoniness, the vacuity, the mind-numbing, bone-wearying, soul-crushing grind? But on the other shoulder stands another angel, whispering, "Because it's worth it." If you care about, say, universal pre-kindergarten -- an issue Hillary has cared about and worked on for decades -- or finding ways to stimulate job growth; if you care about peace abroad and supporting our military families at home; if you care about the climate crisis and full equality for LGBT Americans and voting rights and a million other issues: the best way to make turn those ideas into action is through the presidency.

Hillary will decide soon enough. In the meantime, let's let her listen to both of the angels debating for her heart. And maybe we can even give her a little breathing room as she becomes a grandmother.

We have plenty of other potential presidential candidates. I suspect they'd love the attention.

Time: "Hillary Clinton's Decision Time"

By Joan E. Greve

September 19, 2014, 11:46 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Presumptive 2016 Democratic frontrunner faces a question of timing

Hillary Clinton is widely expected to run for president again in 2016, letting political observers move on from the usual will-she-or-won't-she to another, more nuanced parlor game: When will she announce her candidacy?

"Timing is everything in politics," said Donna Brazile, who managed Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign. A candidate as established as Clinton has "the luxury of timing," Brazile said. "But in politics that luxury can slip away if you don't understand how to seize the moment."

The former Secretary of State has given some mixed messages about when she'll decide. She said in June that she'd be "on the way" to making a decision by the end of the year, and this month she said she'd make a decision "probably after the first of the year." Those are some pretty ambiguous tea leaves for political watchers to try to read—not to mention the fact that she can "make a decision" and still not actually announce her candidacy for months.

But a survey of top political strategists and a look back through presidential campaign history offers one clear clue: As her party's undisputed frontrunner, Clinton is likely to wait as long as possible to pull the trigger.

"The second you announce, the dynamics change completely," said Phil Singer, a Democratic strategist who worked on Clinton's 2008 campaign. "You really fall under the microscope in a way you don't when you're still contemplating whether to run."

So while Clinton announced her 2008 candidacy in January 2007—a full 22 months before the general election—most aren't expecting a Hillary Clinton campaign bus to be rolling over snow early next year. That might not sit well with some Democrats, who increasingly want Clinton to send a clear signal soon—especially if it turns out she's not running. "A 'no' has to come earlier than a 'yes,'" one Democratic strategist told NBC News in August. "If it's a no, I suspect she won't let it drag on."

But despite Democratic jitters, strategists from both parties interviewed by TIME agreed it's in her best interest to wait. As the close attention paid to inartful comments she made about her wealth during her book tour demonstrated, her every word is being scrutinized—a dynamic that will only intensify when she's formally a presidential candidate. Her first visit to Iowa since the 2008 campaign last weekend drew close to 200 members of the media.

"The general public's not paying attention that early, but an important subsection of the public are," said Steve Schmidt, a top strategist on John McCain's 2008 campaign. "The announcement is the first of many system checks that takes place."

In the 2012 campaign, GOP frontrunner (and eventual nominee) Mitt Romney waited until June 2011 to declare his candidacy. At that point five Republicans had already participated in their party's first primary debate. In 1991, Bill Clinton, then the governor of Arkansas, announced 13 months before the general election. In 1979, Ronald Reagan announced his candidacy just 12 months before the polls opened. In 1960, John F. Kennedy, announced his candidacy just 10 months before the November election.

Election cycles have gotten longer and campaigns more permanent over the years, with presidential candidates announcing earlier and earlier. But given Clinton's singular place in the party today, her timing could be more like those of candidates in the more distant past. With the outside super PAC Ready for Hillary already laying the groundwork for her campaign and the Clinton name more than potent enough in Democratic politics to make up fundraising ground even with a late start, Clinton has more to lose than to gain by starting too early, strategists said. Ready for Hillary raised $4 million in 2013, and an array of Clinton allies have jumped into the fold this year, including Correct the Record, a Democratic research group aimed at pushing back against Republican critics of her record, and Priorities USA Action, the former pro-Obama super PAC now backing Clinton.

"She's got the ability to raise hundreds of millions of dollars in a window where her competitors could raise tens of millions of dollars at best," said Rick Wilson, a Florida-based Republican strategist who worked on Rudy Giuliani's 2008 presidential campaign.

Gore formally launched his campaign in June of 1999, enjoying a similar advantage to Clinton's now. "We had the luxury of name recognition and a lot of organization," Brazile said.

Whatever announcement Clinton does make will of course be closely watched, not just for its timing but its substance. In 2007, Barack Obama, then a Senator from Illinois, chose the "arctic cold" of early February in Springfield, Ill., to announce his candidacy before a crowd of approximately 16,000 people.

"The Obama event was like seeing the Rolling Stones," Singer said.

"I think Obama did a very good job in 2008," said Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist who worked on Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign. "I think in part by being able to combine the fundraising aspect of it with the announcement, sort of creating the impression that there was this huge grassroots network that was excited for his candidacy."

Clinton chose a lower profile setting for her announcement: a video posted to her website. "After six years of George Bush, it is time to renew the promise of America," Clinton said at the time. "I grew up in a middle-class family in the middle of America, and we believed in that promise."

The only reasons for Clinton to announce earlier, strategists said, might be to freeze other candidates from getting into the race and to be more free to respond directly to attacks from her Republican opponents.

"I think there will be far fewer Democratic announcements if she announces," said veteran Democratic strategist Bob Shrum, who worked on John Kerry's 2004 campaign. "And I believe she will. I think she is running."

Lehane predicted that other Democrats will start to throw their hats in the ring the moment the midterm elections are over: "12:01 a.m. the first Tuesday of November."

New York Observer: "Benghazi Again"

By Lincoln Mitchell

September 18, 2014 1:12 p.m. EDT

A House of Representatives panel seeking to investigate Benghazi began its work on Wednesday. The committee is co-chaired by Representatives Trey Gowdy and Elijah Cummings. The former is a Republican from South Carolina, the latter a Democrat from Maryland.

Since the attack on a U.S. consulate in Benghazi, Libya on September 11, 2012, in which the U.S. Ambassador to Libya and three other Americans lost their lives, Benghazi has come to stand for more than just the attack itself. It also now refers to the Republican charges that the Obama administration and Secretary of State Hillary Clinton mishandled the incident, contributing to the deaths of American diplomats. This has been viewed by the Republicans as Ms. Clinton's biggest blunder during her term as Secretary of State. Democrats, for their part, have accused Republicans of politicizing the issue and using it to try to derail Ms. Clinton's presidential ambitions.

Efforts to determine what really happened at Benghazi and who, if anybody, in the U.S. government was responsible for allowing the attack to occur have, in the more than two years since the events themselves, almost always been clouded by partisan politics. For years the Republican Party has tried to make Benghazi a negative for Ms. Clinton and President Obama. Former House Majority Leader Eric Cantor's remarks from May of this year –"Well, four brave Americans were killed in Benghazi and to date it appears that more has been done to protect internal emails than to bring the murderers of these Americans to justice" — are illustrative of Republican views of an administration cover up of Benghazi.

The current congressional panel is not, however, simply rehashing the events of September of 2012. Rather, its goals are also to probe the extent to which security and other recommendations from the independent Accountability Review Board that examined what happened at Benghazi have been implemented by the State Department. This is a useful activity for a congressional panel and is precisely how relations between the executive and legislative branches of government should work. The question of whether or not this committee can remain focused on this task rather than devolve into yet another discussion of Benghazi more broadly has not yet been answered.

According to Jamal Ware, communication director for the House Select Committee on Benghazi. "the Committee will operate in a fair, fact-driven and impartial manner that produces a final accounting that is worthy of the sacrifice of the four Americans who were killed in Benghazi and worthy of the trust of our fellow citizens." However, Mr. Ware also makes it clear "This (the committee) will go wherever the facts lead."

Adrienne Elrod, communications director for Correct the Record, a PAC that promotes and defends Hillary Clinton, argues that this is not plausible as "the questions have been asked, answered, rehashed, and relitigated on the tragedy in Benghazi. Multiple committees have extensively investigated the Benghazi tragedy, resulting in more than 50 senior level staff briefings, at least 13 public hearings, dozens of interviews, and the disclosure of more than 25,000 pages of documents."

It is, however, probably no longer in the interest of the Republicans to spend too much time and effort on Benghazi because the political environment is quite different now than it was four years ago. However, as Ms. Elrod notes, "the Republicans have and continue to use the tragedy in Benghazi to raise money," so clearly the issue still resonates with the Republican activist base. Nonetheless When the attack in Benghazi happened, Ms. Clinton was finishing what was viewed at the time as a successful four years at the State Department. In that context, Benghazi had the potential to be a high profile negative on an otherwise strong record and was therefore an attractive target for Republicans.

Things are different now. The world is beset with major crises and there is a growing perception both in the media and public opinion that the Obama administration has done a poor job on foreign policy. Linking Ms. Clinton to those failures is a more effective political tactic than discussing a scandal that has never much damaged Ms. Clinton. A more relevant and serious question for conservative critics to ask Ms. Clinton as she seeks the presidency is to probe why she went along with an administration that wildly under-estimated the danger Russian President Vladimir Putin presented to Ukraine and elsewhere, or her role in Middle East policy that led to the rise of ISIS.

Ms. Clinton's likely answers to these questions, either obfuscating or asserting that she tried, but failed, to persuade the President to act differently, are more damaging, and more likely to give swing voters reason for concern, than more Republican accusations that she did not do enough to prevent the attack at Benghazi. Ironically, further focus on Benghazi may help Ms. Clinton as it takes attention away from more meaningful criticisms and strengthens her campaign narrative that she has long been the target of angry and unfair right wing attacks.

NBC News: "Hillary Clinton to Dem Women: 'Midterms Matter'"

By Carrie Dann

September 19, 2014, 12:45 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton worked to fire up Democratic women Friday as the party looks to turn out its base voters in November's contested midterm elections. "I know they may not be as glamorous as presidential elections, but these upcoming midterm elections really are crucial to our country's future," she told the audience at a Democratic National Committee women's leadership forum in Washington.

Highlighting the role that female lawmakers have had in breaking Washington gridlock and advocating for progressive policies, Clinton praised a "movement" of women making a difference in government. "Don't let anyone dismiss what you're doing here today as women's work," she said. "Don't let anyone send you back to the sidelines."

Clinton didn't mention her own possible presidential ambitions, but she did note that she is on "grandbaby watch" as her daughter Chelsea prepares for the birth of her first child.

She also offered a vociferous defense of DNC chair Debbie Wasserman Schultz, who introduced the former secretary of state. Wasserman Schultz has been under the spotlight after POLITICO reported that her fellow Democrats believe she is "becoming a liability" to the committee.

Politico: "Hillary Clinton to women: Remember the midterms"

By Edward-Isaac Dovere

September 19, 2014, 1:13 p.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton on Friday urged Democratic women to prioritize the midterms, for the sake of advancing women's rights — and also in defense of a larger progressive agenda.

"We're here because there's a movement stirring in America," Clinton said, citing issues such as paid sick leave, equal pay, affordable childcare and a living wage for fast-food workers. "This is a movement that is not waiting for Washington with its gridlock and grandstanding. This movement won't wait, and neither will we."

Clinton spoke as part of a full-day schedule of top Democrats addressing the Democratic National Committee's Women's Leadership Forum issues conference. Vice President Joe Biden spoke earlier in the morning, and President Barack Obama is scheduled for the afternoon.

Every word Clinton says and every move she makes is being parsed for meaning about her presidential plans, but Clinton urged the crowd not to forget the midterms.

"I know that they might not be as glamorous as presidential elections," she said with a smile, leaning back from the microphone for a moment in her bright gold top.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Citing paycheck fairness, the Supreme Court's Hobby Lobby decision and the resistance to renewing the Violence Against Women Act, Clinton said the decision is between Republicans and "leaders who will fight for women and girls to have the same opportunities and rights that they deserve."

Clinton singled out the Hobby Lobby decision, and those she said applauded it, for special attack. The decision allows employers with religious objections to opt out of providing insurance coverage for contraception.

"I think it's fair to say that just as the Affordable Care Act was going into effect, the Supreme Court's Hobby Lobby decision pulled the rug out from beneath America's women," Clinton said, in one of her biggest applause lines of the speech. "It's a slippery slope when we start turning over a woman's right to make her own health care decisions to her employer."

Together, she said, there is only one question: "Will Congress do anything about it? That's why midterms matter."

Clinton hasn't spoken much publicly about the impending birth of her first grandchild, but Friday, that's how she anchored her argument.

"I've been thinking a lot about family, because as you know, I'm on grand-baby watch. And I think a lot about this new member of our family and what he or she can look forward to," Clinton said.

"The Democratic Party is at its best, just like America is at its best, when we rally behind a very simple but powerful idea: family."

Time: "Hillary Clinton Pledges to Campaign for Female Democratic Candidates"

By Jay Newton-Small

September 19, 2014, 1:14 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Calling out Senate and gubernatorial candidates by name, Clinton pledges to help get every woman on the ballot elected

Hillary Clinton plunged back into the political waters Friday by pledging to work to get all the female Democratic candidates on the ballot elected in November.

"I can't think of a better way to make the House work again than electing every woman on the ballot," Clinton told the Democratic Women's Leadership Forum, a group she helped start more than 20 years ago with former Second Lady Tipper Gore. "There are 10 women running for the Senate, six women running for governor and I wish I could vote for all of them."

Clinton called out several candidates by name: Senate challengers Michelle Nunn in Georgia, Alison Lundergan Grimes in Kentucky and West Virginia's Natalie Tennant, incumbent Sens. Kay Hagan in North Carolina and Jeanne Shaheen in New Hampshire, and House candidate Staci Appel in Iowa.

The former Secretary of State particularly tout former Trek Bicycle executive Mary Burke, who is challenging Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker. "Burke she is offering a choice between more angry gridlock," Clinton said, "and… smart progressive policies."

Clinton said she wanted to see a movement of women rise up to take back the government. "We're in the home stretch and it all comes down on who shows up to vote," she told the crowd of female Democratic organizers, many of whom will be relied on to turn out female voters in

The Atlantic: “Does Hillary Clinton Have Anything to Say?”

By Molly Ball

September 19, 2014, 10:08 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] The presumed presidential candidate's speeches are long on pablum and short on content. This is the campaign we're in for.

Everywhere Hillary Clinton goes, a thousand cameras follow. Then she opens her mouth, and nothing happens.

Clinton made a much-ballyhooed appearance in Iowa over the weekend, giving a speech widely noted for its substancelessness. She “had no explicit message of her own,” Politico noted, while The Economist pronounced it “underwhelming.” MSNBC’s Joe Scarborough was so frustrated by Clinton’s lack of verve that he went on an extended rant about it, proclaiming, “I know her and like her, but she puts on that political hat and she’s a robot!” The coverage of Clinton’s speech seemed to contain more meditation about how anodyne she was than reporting of what she actually said.

The Iowa campaign speech that wasn’t a campaign speech (delivered at a "steak fry" that wasn’t a steak fry—the steaks are grilled) followed a year’s worth of nearly newsless Clintoniana. She wrote a book that reviewers unanimously described as stale and safe, valuable mostly for the hints it offered of her future positioning. Reviewing Henry Kissinger’s new book for The Washington Post a few weeks ago, Clinton boldly declared the need for “a real national dialogue” to “take on the perils and the promise of the 21st century,” while dodging any prescriptions of her own for today's vexing foreign-policy dilemmas. Last month, when Clinton caused a firestorm by telling my colleague Jeffrey Goldberg that President Obama’s foreign-affairs philosophy, “Don’t do stupid stuff,” was “not an organizing principle,” he pressed her to name a better one. “Peace, progress, and prosperity,” she said, as though that were any closer to being something you could organize a nation around.

That Clinton is a risk-averse, pragmatic politician has been her hallmark for years, of course—it’s just another way in which her current persona offers nothing new or surprising. Has America ever been so thoroughly tired of a candidate before the campaign even began?

On Thursday, I went to see Clinton in Washington, where she was speaking on a panel about women’s economic challenges at the Center for American Progress. Clinton boldly posited that people who work hard and do their best, particularly parents, deserve economic security. “We talk about a glass ceiling, but these women don’t even have a floor underneath them,” she said of workers who rely on tips. “This is not a women’s issue, this is a family issue, and it certainly is a children’s issue,” she added. “We have to do more to bring these issues to the forefront.”

When it was House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi’s turn to speak, Clinton gazed out at the audience, nodding sagely, seeming to know that all the cameras were trained on her. A laundry list of well-worn leftish ideas, from raising the minimum wage to paid family leave and affordable childcare, was touted. Granted, these are substantive proposals, and they are controversial in some quarters. But they are broadly popular, and the overall message—that women ought to prosper—is almost impossible to disagree with. The discussion’s only spark came from Kirsten Gillibrand, the senator from New York, who made a rousing call to action. “I think we need a Rosie the Riveter moment for this generation!” Gillibrand said, to the event's only applause.

Gillibrand, who replaced Clinton in the Senate, has been ubiquitous lately as she promotes her new book. She has also been touted as a presidential candidate, but always demurs, saying she supports Clinton. Earlier this week, when I pressed her on what she’d say if Clinton doesn’t run, she pronounced the question irrelevant, as Clinton is clearly running. It was Clinton who originally inspired Gillibrand to want to run for office: An Asian Studies major at Dartmouth, Gillibrand was working at a law firm when Clinton gave her famous “women’s rights are human rights” speech in Beijing in 1995. The junior lawyer suddenly felt her path to be inadequate, she told me.

The story was a reminder that Clinton does inspire passion in some people, or did at one time. The Clinton-boosting super PAC Ready for Hillary has signed up more than 2.5 million supporters. Thousands flocked to the Iowa steak fry, if only to catch a glimpse of someone very famous. As Dave Weigel noted, Clinton's boringness is mostly a problem for the press, not the public.

On Thursday, Clinton rushed to echo Gillibrand's statements. "Kirsten told stories—we could all tell stories about people we know who have been really egregiously impacted by the failure of our political leadership on the other side of the aisle," she said after an anecdote about a woman whose career never recovered from taking time off to care for an injured child. To the "Rosie the Riveter" sentiment, she added, "We need people to feel that they're part of a movement. It's not just an election."

Clinton is in a bind, as the political scientist Lynn Vavreck noted in The New York Times at the height of her understimulating book tour. "The only thing the tour is missing is the central element of a campaign: a raison d'etre, a vision," Vavreck wrote. Clinton can't talk about what she would do as the country's leader without admitting that's what she's seeking to do. But will that change once she officially becomes a candidate? Based on the evidence, I wouldn't hold my breath.

McCain Interviewed on ABC World News, Claims the Mantel of Change vs. Obama, Discusses Iraq, McBush, Campaign Finance, and More; Says the Principal Electoral Issues are "Reform, Prosperity, and Peace" and He's An "Underdog"
GIBSON: Senator, are you relieved to know finally who you're going to run against?

MCCAIN: I guess, in a way. It was, I think, pretty apparent there for a while that it was going to be Senator Obama. And I called and congratulated Senator Clinton on the great race that she ran and the ability to inspire millions of women all over America and the world and congratulated her on her campaign.

And I also called Senator Obama yesterday and congratulated him, as well.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GIBSON: When this thing was more in doubt, did you have a preference?

MCCAIN: No. I really didn't. I don't know enough about what the outcome is -- what the effect's going to be. So I think both of them are -- either one would have been very challenging. And Senator Obama will -- I'm sure that we'll have a very close race.

GIBSON: Do you in any way run a different campaign against Obama than you would have run against Clinton?

MCCAIN: I don't think so. I think -- maybe some of the states change a little bit, but, overall, I think it's going to be fundamentally differences in positions, principles, views, policies, and both foreign and domestic.

And so I think it was -- because they're very similar, I don't think that the debate would have been significantly different.

GIBSON: In my lifetime, I don't think I'd ever seen a primary and caucus race like the Democrats had. Did you feel at times in the past few months like the forgotten candidate?

MCCAIN: Yes, occasionally I thought -- it was a little hard for us to break through with the message, but I also understand it. There was a lot of excitement there. I mean, Senator Clinton just won South Dakota. I mean, obviously, it went right up to the end.

So I understand. And now, obviously, the focus is going to be on both of us. And the good news is that it's five months, and the bad news is it's five months.

GIBSON: Do you feel in any way as if you're running against history?

MCCAIN: No, I think that it's very clear that Americans want change. It doesn't -- you don't have to be in politics to know that. They want change. The question is, is what kind of change, the right change or the wrong change?

I have a record of fighting against the special interests, of investigating corruption, of fighting for reform, whether it be campaign finance reform, or ethics and lobbying, one of the reasons why I was never elected Miss Congeniality in the United States Senate.

So I do have a record of change and reform and fighting for it and achieving some -- a lot of it. But there's a lot more that needs to be done.

Senator Obama talks about change, but, clearly, he has no record of it. So we'll be debating what kind of change that America wants, whether it be our effort in which we have to carry out and succeed in, independence of foreign oil, or whether it be the war in Iraq or the overall struggle we're in against radical Islamic extremism. Who is best qualified? Who can best bring about change for America?

GIBSON: But when I ask about running against history, you are of an age, as am I, when segregation was the law of the land in this country.

MCCAIN: Yes.

GIBSON: Did you ever think you'd see a day when there was a black man nominated to represent one of the two major American parties?

MCCAIN: Oh, I did, because -- as I felt that someday there will be a woman who is president of the United States, because I have a great faith in the American people. And I have a great faith in their sense of justice and their judgment of people on their qualities, as Dr. King said, not by the -- by the content of their character, not by the color of their skin. I hope I didn't mangle that quote.

So I have great faith that America would select someone and will, either man, woman, no matter who they are, as far as -- more on their qualities and their leadership and the way they can lead the country than any other quality.

But at the same time, Senator Obama has done a remarkable thing. We both started as long shots. And he did, too. And I think, obviously, all Americans give him great credit.

GIBSON: He said on Tuesday night, when he was in Minneapolis, or St. Paul, he said, "John McCain has served this country heroically. I honor that service and I respect his many accomplishments, even if he chooses to deny mine."

Do you think he's qualified to be president?

MCCAIN: Oh, I think that's a judgment that the American people will make. It's not up to me to say that. It's up to me to point out that I have the experience and the knowledge and the judgment, and the right kind of change and the right kind of record, but most importantly a plan of action for the future.

Look, the Democratic Party has just determined that Senator Obama is qualified. Now it'll be up to the American people, and I'm sure that they judge both of us as qualified. I think that it's going to be a question of who's more qualified or the most qualified.

GIBSON: What kind of a relationship do you go into this election with him, having with him? You had a very testy exchange of letters a couple of years ago.

MCCAIN: Yes, once we had an exchange -- I had a letter to him over an issue. In fact, it had to do with ethics and lobbying reform. But I've always had a cordial relationship with Senator Obama. I didn't know him as well as I know Senator Clinton, and I hadn't worked with him as much as I had Senator Clinton. Senator Clinton and I were both on the Armed Services Committee.

But we've always had a cordial and respectful relationship. And I'll do everything I can to maintain that during this campaign. Americans are tired of the partisanship or the fighting of the -- impugning of character.

They want a real debate here, and that's why I challenged him -- or invited him, is a better word -- for us to do a series of 10 town hall meetings across this country, one a week between now and the Democratic convention. And let's start next week at Federal Hall in New York.

And, you know, I think the town hall meeting is the essence of democracy. Why not let people come and ask us both questions? I think that's what it's about. I think, from my own experience, that town hall meetings are more beneficial both to the candidate, as well as the voter.

GIBSON: Senator Obama, when we talked to him yesterday, said he was going to accept. He said, "Senator McCain has generously offered to me to start next week." He said, "I just got the nomination, and I think that's a little premature," but indicated that he was certainly interested in doing some of those.

It sounds to me like you both, actually, in these town meetings think that you've got the other guy on your turf.

MCCAIN: I'm not so sure I think that. I think one of the great regrets of the tragedy in Dallas was the campaign that we missed between Senator Barry Goldwater, my predecessor, and President Jack Kennedy.

They had agreed -- they agreed, because they knew each other well from their days in the Senate, that they would travel around the country on the same plane and go to a town, and have debate and discussion, and town hall meetings, and then go to another one.

I think America missed a rare opportunity at that time. Look at what campaigns have deteriorated into, and I mean deteriorated: sound bites, gotchas, attack ads, 527s.

So I think this may be trying to revive what I think most Americans would have approved of way back in the 1960s and they certainly want today.

GIBSON: On what three issues, principal issues, do you think this election will turn?

MCCAIN: Reform, prosperity and peace. Reform of government in the way we do business, which is geared to the '60s and '70s and not responsive to the new challenges.

Prosperity, obviously, Americans are hurting badly, keeping their homes, the job loss. The continued deterioration of certain -- a lot of aspects of our economy.

And, of course, security. I believe that the war in Iraq has far more effects than just Iraq. I think it is the central battleground of the struggle against radical Islamic extremism, as General David Petraeus portrayed it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And I think that our treatment of Iran, the conflict in Afghanistan, the entire globe now is beset with challenges to our nation's security. And I think that, also, will be a very big issue.

And I will be compared -- glad to compare my vision and my view of how we secure this nation's future with that of Senator Obama. I think he was wrong about the surge when he said it would fail, and I think he's been wrong on other aspects of national security issues, and a lot of that is due to inexperience.

GIBSON: Do you worry that it might turn on race and age?

MCCAIN: I hope neither. Look, I believe in the decency and fairness of the American people. If I didn't believe that, I wouldn't be seeking to lead them. I think they're the finest, fairest, most decent people in the world.

And, of course, we have extremes in our society that do things which are not in keeping with the principles and, frankly, the greatness of this nation. But, overall, a vast majority of Americans are fair, decent people, and they're going to judge who they want to lead on the basis of how they think that person can lead.

GIBSON: Senator Obama, during the primary campaign, has felt the need to address the issue of race. Do you have to address it, do you think, in your campaign in any way?

MCCAIN: I don't think I have to address the issue of race. I have tried to on various venues address the issue of age. You know, on "Saturday Night Live," when I said the person -- the primary qualification for president has to be someone who's very, very, very old.

But I think, as in the primary, the voters will judge me by the way I campaign and what my vision is and what they view my vitality and strengths are. And that's where I think that I can convince them, that not only do I have the age, but I have the experience and knowledge to make the kinds of judgments that are necessary to keep the nation safe and prosperous.

GIBSON: Are you the underdog?

MCCAIN: Oh, yes, I think so. I think so. I think -- I'm surprised, frankly, to see the polls as close as they are, given our brand problems in the Republican Party. I'm pleased where we are.

But I also think that, not unlike the primaries, that Americans pay attention, but, really, when they start to pay attention is really during the convention and sort of during what has traditionally been the campaign season, after Labor Day.

GIBSON: What's the biggest obstacle that you face to getting elected?

MCCAIN: I think energizing independents and the Reagan Democrats, both old and new, to have a look and see if they can understand that I'm the best qualified to serve.

I think that that's -- we're going to be in kind of a presidential campaign where the independents, Reagan Democrats, would be the reason why I win.

I think we have unified the party pretty well, but I've got to assure everyone that I'm going to be the president of all Americans. That's what they have to have confidence in; that's what they want now.

GIBSON: There may be some disaffected Clinton voters out there coming out of this primary, upset that their candidate didn't get it. What do you do to appeal to them?

MCCAIN: National security, reform, assurance that I will represent every American as president of the United States, ability, proven record of bipartisanship. Senator Obama talks about bipartisanship. In all due respect, I have a record of working with Ted Kennedy, and Russ Feingold, and Joe Lieberman, and Carl Levin, and Byron Dorgan.

And that's the way I've been able to achieve legislative success. You have to do that in Senate. I'm glad to do it. The problems that face America today require us to work across the aisle and together for America.

We saw America do that right after 9/11. We haven't seen it in a long time.

GIBSON: Your opponent seems to think that you have a hyphenated name. He refers to you continually as "Bush-McCain."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: Yes, I saw that.

GIBSON: I asked about the largest obstacle. How large an obstacle is the incumbent president?

MCCAIN: I hear that over and over from the Democrats and from Senator Obama, and I understand that political tactic. I don't think it's going to work. I think Americans know me. They didn't just get to know me yesterday. I think they know me.

And I think that they'll be looking not -- again, what Americans want now, in my opinion, from having literally hundreds of town hall meetings, what are you going to do about gas prices? What are you going to do about health care? What are you going to do about the threats that we face from radical Islamic extremism?

I haven't heard anybody at a town hall meeting, although I'm sure that it's on their minds, say, "Well, you're too close to President Bush." What they've said is, "What's your plan of action?" That's what they're interested in, and that's how I think that I can meet that particular campaign tactic.

GIBSON: And yet if you look at this from outside, if somebody were just coming into this country, they would say, you know, what chance does the Republican have? Every major issue would mitigate against him.

We have a war which is unpopular. We have an economy that is in very difficult shape from the housing crisis. We have fuel prices that are through the roof, and we have consumer confidence so very low right now. That, it seems to me, puts the Republican candidate in a very difficult situation.

MCCAIN: I do not underestimate the size of this challenge, OK? But I also know that the American people right now are judging us, one, as fairly even, but also they're going to examine us. That's the strength of this process, is that they'll examine the candidates.

What is that candidate's record? But, most importantly, what is their vision for the future?

In other words, let me just mention one of those areas that you talked about very quickly, the war in Iraq. It's clear that the surge is succeeding. We are winning in Iraq now, at great cost, at great sacrifice.

The mishandling of the war for nearly four years, which I fought against and fought for this new strategy. Senator Obama opposed the surge, said it wouldn't work, and said it was doomed to failure, and said that he would withdraw.

I believe, if we'd had done what he said -- and I think it's becoming clearer and clearer to the American people there would have been chaos, genocide, and we'd have been back. But also, now with success, it has beneficial effects throughout the region, as well.

I'm willing to make that case. As you know, when I was running and no one gave me a chance, and they said, "Well, because you're supporting the surge," one of the reasons. I said at that time I would much rather lose a political campaign than lose a war. Well, I was right.

And I'm right about Iran. And I'm right about a lot of these other issues. And I'm not always right. But I think that I can assure people that our nation's national security challenges will be met with experience and knowledge and judgment.

GIBSON: Senator Obama said to me yesterday he will go to Iraq...

MCCAIN: Good.

GIBSON: ... this summer. Do you think inevitably he's going to modify his position about the pace of withdrawal, as we get into the general election campaign?

MCCAIN: I have every confidence that, if Senator Obama goes to Iraq, meets with General Petraeus, and the sergeant majors and the captains and the colonels and the corporals, that he will know that this strategy is succeeding and he would modify -- would change his position, and support what's being done over there, and bring us home, but bring us home with honor and victory, not defeat.

MCCAIN: Americans want that, too.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GIBSON: What's your timetable for choosing a vice president?

MCCAIN: We're just in the initial stages and try to get it done as soon as possible, but not too early. You know...

GIBSON: Do you want to do it before the convention?

MCCAIN: What I've seen in the past is that everybody that's a presidential nominee says, "OK, I'm going to get this done by this and this, this," and then, all of a sudden, "Whoops, we've got to -- did we consider this and that?" And they end up really fighting up against a really deadline.

I hope we can avoid that. But, right now, we're still in the initial stages.

GIBSON: Do you want to get it done before the convention?

MCCAIN: I'd like to very much. I'd like to get it done before the convention, yes.

GIBSON: Public financing...

MCCAIN: Yes.

GIBSON: ... are you going to take it?

MCCAIN: Well, I certainly -- as you know, Senator Obama signed a piece of paper saying that he would take it if I would take it. I still want to take it. We haven't made a final decision if he doesn't take it, but I would hope that he would keep his word.

GIBSON: If he opts out, will you?

MCCAIN: I don't know. We'd have to look and see how much money -- not only how much money we could raise, but how much time you spend away from actually campaigning. That's the problem. The benefit of taking the public financing is that then you don't have to worry about the fundraising.

And so I haven't made a final decision. But, a little straight talk, we'd certainly lean towards it, but I would hope that Senator Obama would also keep his word.

GIBSON: Today, he's going to say that he's going to tell the Democratic National Committee not to accept any contributions from federal lobbyists or PACs, consistent with his policy in his campaign. Do you do the same?

MCCAIN: Yes, but I hadn't thought about it, but we certainly have -- he's taken lots and lots of money from people who have special interests in Washington. And so I'd have to look at it.

I hadn't thought about it much before, but I am proud to say we have the most stringent and transparent policy about lobbyists in our campaign than any campaign in history.

GIBSON: I asked you about your vice presidency. It just occurred the question -- do you have any thoughts you might be running against an Obama-Clinton ticket?

MCCAIN: I hadn't thought that much about it, but obviously it would be a formidable ticket. But I also think there's a lot of people out there that could make it a formidable ticket, as well. And I know that a lot of times, too, we place emphasis on the running mate and, at the end of the day, it's the top of the ticket that most Americans make their selection from.

GIBSON: There are reports that, when you first announced your campaign, that you were very close to taking a pledge that you'd be a one-term president if elected. Is that true?

MCCAIN: No. There's been many proposals made to me. As I was going through the announcement tour, somebody proposed it, but I didn't seriously consider it.

GIBSON: You're a very private man. And Karl Rove wrote a piece recently that said, if people really knew what had gone on when you were in captivity in Hanoi, that it would tell them a lot about your character that they don't otherwise know. Do you intend to talk about that much during the campaign?

MCCAIN: No, because I'm a flawed man. The great honor of my life was to have the privilege of serving in the company of heroes, of observing 1,000 acts of courage and compassion and love with men who were far, far better than I am.

GIBSON: But he talked about the generosity that you had exhibited and that he had knowledge of to other people who were imprisoned with you. Are those people we might hear from during the campaign? Or is this just a chapter that you're going to...

MCCAIN: Well, I'm proud to have the support of so many of the people that I was in prison camp with, yes, people like Colonel Bud Day, Congressional Medal of Honor winner, and others. I'm glad to have their support and their active participation.

I think what Karl Rove was talking about, to some degree, was I did have an opportunity to come home early from prison camp. And, obviously, in some ways, that was tempting. But at the end of the day, it was not something that I could have ever done.

GIBSON: Eight months ago, you were in a campaign that was broke...

MCCAIN: History.

GIBSON: You were written off by most people. I guess what I'm asking is, how badly, in your gut, do you want to win? Or was getting the nomination, coming back enough?

MCCAIN: I want to win, obviously. And I'm going to work 24/7 in order to try to become the president of the United States. It's very humbling to have the nomination of the party of Abraham Lincoln and Theodore Roosevelt and Ronald Reagan.

But I don't want it so badly that I would do something that later I would look back on as something that was less than the kind of conduct that I would want my children and family and friends to respect.

GIBSON: I've heard you say on a couple of occasions, "I'm very comfortable with myself, win or lose." But as you said that, I thought to myself, "Is it in him? Does he want this deep down in his gut?" Because that's what it takes.

MCCAIN: Well, I think, if you just mentioned in the last year, after we were written off, and I was carrying my own bags in Group C on Southwest Airlines, I think I showed that we -- I wasn't willing to give up. And I've had other challenges, in fact, greater challenges than this campaign in my life that I didn't give up. I think I can assure the American people of that.

GIBSON: Senator, it's good to talk to you.

MCCAIN: Thank you, Charlie.

Yet McCain shares George Bush's preoccupation with Democracy Promotion. In fact, McCain would take even a step further. He wants to create a League of Democracies, a kind of United Nations, but one that would exclude among others two of the world's biggest countries, Russia and China. In fact, McCain wants to throw Russia out of the G8 and prevent China from joining.

MCCAIN: We should start by insuring that the G8, a group of 8 highly industrialized states, becomes again a club of leading market democracies that should include Brazil and India but exclude Russia.

ZAKARIA: It's sure to antagonize lots of countries that don't want to find themselves in a new Cold War, trying to pick sides. OLBERMANN: [...] I use the word lie, The report does not use the word lies, are there lies?

RICHARD CLARK: There certainly are, this is a big report but what it says is statements by the president were not substantiated by intelligence and then it says statements by the president were contradicted by available intelligence. In other words, they made things up [...]
OLBERMANN: What are we to make now in light of the political realities of today of Senator McCain 's undiminished enthusiasm for and defense of the war specifically that this remarkable thing that every intel assessment of the time were screaming WMD.

RICHARD CLARKE: Well Senator McCain's Statements are contradicted by the facts too, the facts in a senate report. The facts that republican senators voted for he is a big proponent of the war. Fox News Panel Debates "McBush" Title, Cite McCain's 95% Vote Record With Bush (FNC 06/05/08 3:47pm)
SHEPARD SMITH: There was a time when being associated with the sitting President might've been a good thing, but the truth is President Bush's approval ratings are so far down that that picture is not one John McCain wants to be seeing. McCain's now trying to highlight his differences with the Commander-in-Chief. […] Is this working?

MARY ANNE MARSH: It is. You can already see it in the polls. The fact is a lot of people do think John McCain right now will be the third term of George Bush for one simple reason—

SMITH: You know what? He is the farthest thing from-- I mean, let's face it. Over time he and George Bush have been oil and water, haven't they?

MARSH: Well 8 years is an eternity. […] The benefit of this long Democratic primary, Shep, is Barack Obama has become better known and better-liked than John McCain. So when he says things like, 'John McCain's gonna be the third George Bush term,' voters are believing it.

SMITH: Erica, what is it that John McCain can do to sort of shake this new label that's being pinned upon him, 'Third Bush Term'?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ERIKA ANDERSEN: Well look it's easy for Barack Obama and the Democrats to throw out this "McBush" term. But the truth is, if you look at John McCain's 20-year Senate record, you can see that he's very different from George Bush. In fact, he has been more bipartisan than probably any other nominee for President that we've seen in a very long time. So, to think that the voters are really going to buy this easy target is pretty ridiculous.

SMITH: Bipartisan legislation is something you can look up and that's a fact. […] Nonetheless, Barack Obama has been able--or his team's been able to come up with a 95% voting the same between George Bush and John McCain. I mean, how do they get there, and is that part working?

MARSH: It is. […] They got there by taking votes and showing where John McCain marched in lockstep with George Bush. And the fact that George Bush is so unpopular with all voters right now, even Republicans, that's really starting to hurt McCain. You not only see it in the polls, but there's a reason John McCain raised it […] in the speech he gave Tuesday night. If it weren't hurting him, he wouldn't have addressed it. The problem is neither McCain, the Republicans or the White House can combat it because they don't have the credibility with the voters right now.

SMITH (parroting): McCousins – two of a kind.

ANDERSEN: […] Yeah of course there're gonna be some policies that McCain and Bush agree on. But the fact of the matter is that McCain is so vastly different from George Bush that Republicans didn't even want him as their nominee to begin with. […] It's just an easy target. And Barack Obama is just […] being vague, as usual, instead of giving any specifics of what he means by that.

LOU DOBBS: Senator Obama, or Senator McCain for that matter, will have a tremendous task of trying to end corruption in our nation's capital. The simple fact is that lobbying firms are a huge industry in the capital and as we've reported here before, there are now 41,386 lobbyists registered with the Senate Public Records Office [...] The Obama and McCain campaigns today responded, sort of, to my challenge here to end the revolving door between presidential administrations and lobbyists. I challenge both candidates to insist that anyone in their administration will not be allowed to serve as a lobbyist for five years and I said the next president should make that a legislative priority in his first 100 days in office [...] Senator Obama has clearly not accepted my challenge but I've got to give him great credit, that is a lot better than what we're getting now [...] As for the McCain campaign, they said they would pass on my challenge today [...] By the way, let me just very direct, good beginning Senator Obama, Senator McCain, you got a lot of work to do.

Newsweek Sr. Editor Takes Swipe at McCain for Burmese Lobbying Connection, Analyzes Differences with Obama on Economy (MSNBC 06/05/08 4:35pm)

DAVID SCHUSTER: Today Barack Obama is trying to underscore that his campaign and his party will not be beholden to any Washington special interests. […]

(video clip of Obama)

SCHUSTER: That of course is something of a rip at John McCain, who has already taken a beating for his ties to lobbyists. […] On the issue of corporate influence, to be fair, it's not as if Barack Obama has excluded all corporate influence on his campaign, right?

DANIEL GROSS: Well he doesn't exactly have people who have been lobbying for the military regime of Burma on his campaign bus. But people in his circle have engaged in lobbying. […] And the notion that companies and lobbyists will not contribute to the party is sort of beyond his control. […]

SCHUSTER: Overall, on the economy, break down the fundamental differences in approach between John McCain and Barack Obama […]

GROSS: The contrasts between them on economic policy are almost as sharp [as those on foreign policy]. A couple of years ago, I think McCain and Obama would've been closer to one another on the economy. But the primary process has pulled McCain to the Right—he's endorsed Bush tax cuts, which he opposed. And it's pulled Obama to the Left […] And what it comes down to is that on taxes and fiscal policy generally, McCain is embracing the Bush legacy; he wants to extend all those tax cuts. He's a hard core free-trader. And Obama of course is more nuanced […] So it's really the kind of differences you've seen between Democrats and Republicans in the past, even those these are not conventional candidates for either party. It's gonna be pretty close to a repeat of 2000 and 2004 on a lot of these economic issues.

SCHUSTER: And Dan, what do you see as the biggest economic issue this summer?

GROSS: Well we can talk about gas prices and housing[…] Along with unemployment […] But […] I think, rather than specific items—like 'let's […] stop foreclosures,' 'let's have a gas tax holiday'—it's this bigger issue of what's gonna happen going forward in the future; are we still gonna be the world's economic leader.

Carly Fiorina Claims McCain Has Run Most Transparent Campaign as Far as Lobbyists (MSNBC 06/05/08 1:41pm)

ANDREA MITCHELL: Carly Fiorina is the Republican National Committee victory chairwomen and McCain supporter and surrogate. That's a lot of money.

CARLY FIORINA: It is!

MITCHELL: Of course, Barack Obama has been a fundraising machine. How do the republicans compete? This is an unusual position for republicans to be in? But your competing against someone who has really revolutionized the way to use the internet and to have small dollar donors who you can keep going back to over and over again.

FIORINA: That's right and we should give Barack Obama his due, but it's also true that now that we're in the general election, RNC money counts, Republican National Committee money counts, and DNC money counts. And the RNC has outraised the DNC nine to one. So the truth is today, John McCain has more cash on hand and more money that Barack Obama does. John McCain has, even before this $21 million, about $60 million dollars. Barack Obama, by last count including the DNC, had about $50 million. So we feel really good about the amount of money we have and the ability to run the kind of campaign that John McCain wants to run.

MITCHELL: What does John McCain do to reach out to, perhaps, to disaffected Hillary Clinton supporters? He praised her lavishly Tuesday night, at his speech Tuesday night, when this democratic campaign was all being decided officially. What is his strategy for going after women, going after Independent voters? Going after hispanics, blue collar voters, the core of Hillary Clinton's constituency?

FIORINA: Well, first as we know this election will be won by reaching out to people in the middle. And that includes all of the groups that you just mentioned. John McCain's lavish praise of Hillary Clinton was not some political act. I have been with him privately over the last 15 months and he genuinally has great respect for her, as he does for Barack Obama. We're going to reach out to women by talking to women in particular about the issues that matter to them. Whether it's women as small business owners. Women open small businesses at twice the rate as men do. And so how small businesses are encouraged to grow is an issue of great importance to women. We're going to talk to them about health care, we're going to talk to them about education. When we reach out to Hispanics, we will talk with them about John McCain's leadership on difficult issues like immigration. We will talk to them about values which are important to them, And as well, we'll talk to them about those same things because hispanic small business owners are among he fastest growing segments in our economy today.

MITCHELL: What about putting a women on the ticket?

FIORINA: Well, that's up to John McCain. And I'm sure that he has many qualified women, as well as many qualified men, that he can choose from. And he'll make that decision. But I think women ultimately are going to vote because they believe the candidate for president understands them and represents their views on issues that matter to them.

MITCHELL: Has anyone asked you for your personal data or finances, to start any kind of vetting process?

FIORINA: Well, you know, if a vetting process is done well, you never know you're being asked for it.

MITCHELL: But has it begun in any fashion?

FIORINA: Well, actually I had to be vetted in to take the victory 08 chairman job, so there's been some vetting that has gone on in my case.

MITCHELL: Lobbyists. Big issue already. But today, Barack Obama tried to sort of, raise the stakes. This is what he had to say at an event in Bristol, VA.

BARACK OBAMA: Today, as the democratic nominee for president, I'm announcing that going forward, the Democratic National Committee will uphold the same standards. We will not take a dime from Washington lobbyists or special interest PAC's. We're going to change how Washington works. They will not fund my party. They will not run our White House and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I'm President of the United States of America.

MITCHELL: So, Barack Obama has gotten the Democratic National Committee to accept the standards that he has already established for his campaign. That creates a contrast with republicans.

FIORINA: Well,yes, but I also think the reality creates a contrast with that rhetoric. I can remember being on this show on the past, Andrea, and you and i had talked about how much money Barack Obama had gotten from the pharmaceutical industry, how much money he had gotten from the oil and gas industry. So I think we really need to understand.

MITCHELL: You mean from oil executives?

FIORINA: And from PACS and from people who represent those companies. So I think, as is usually the case, the devil's going to be in the details a little bit here, and we need to understand what he means. Having said that, i would reiterate that John McCain has implemented the most transparent, the most strenuous policy with regard to the connection of lobbyists to his own campaign and he's challenged Barack Obama a number of times to implement the same policy.

MITCHELL: Tuesday night, you had this very stark contrast of John McCain speaking, and then at the same time Barack Obama. Barack Obama one of the most articulate, eloquent orators in contemporary politics. John McCain was criticized by many for not being able to read a telepromter and his campaign was criticized for not putting him in the best light. Karen Tumulty in Time Magazine made the point, he said, "Compared with McCain's, Obama's operation has been a model of efficiency and executive function. Obama has already changed the way politics is practiced in America and he is poised to keep doing so." Should McCain ramp up? Should his organization try to compete on the optics? The way Ronald Reagan's campaign did?

FIORINA: Well, I think first, it's important to recognize that Barack Obama is an incredibly gifted speaker. I think it's also important to recognize though, that the candidate has to be themselves. John McCain is a unique leader, it's one of the reasons I have backed him for the last 15 months. He will never be a person of soaring rhetoric. But he is a person that walks the walk. He acts in concert with his beliefs. He is a person of courage and conviction, and I think that as long as the American people see him for who he really is, John McCain will be the next President of the United States.

MITCHELL: And before I let you go. His proposal for town meetings and getting on the bus together, these two candidates going across America, is that realistic?

FIORINA: Well, I hope so. I know that he hopes, and I hope as well that the Obama campaign will accept that challenge because it's an opportunity for people to actually engage in dialogue. And I think if you've ever watched John McCain speak at a town hall, it's a real dialogue. It's not a canned speech, there's no telepromters. It's a give and take, a back and forth between a voter and a candidate, and I think that is what democracy is all about.

Fox News' Neil Cavuto Says Obama is a "Media Darling" and McCain Thus Has a "Real Fight on His Hands" (FNC 06/05/08 5:00pm)

NEIL CAVUTO: John McCain's got a real fight on his hands, not with Barack Obama, with the media. I don't think I have ever seen such fawning coverage of a candidate. Look clearly history has been made and it is remarkable. The first African American to lead a presidential ticket. It is historic but it is not biblical. Yet somehow, the oldest man ever to capture a party's nomination doesn't have quite the same Kennedy-vega ring to it. So McCain's stories are perfunctory and Obama's darn near legendary. This is what McCain is up against. A guy who's a gifted speaker, smooth debater, but more a media darling. Talk of a TV producer crying when she heard the news Obama clinched it. Still, another anchor insisting America has grown. Still another waxing, "this is remarkable, unprecedented." I don't remember Old John provoking such tears or praise. Anyone calling him remarkable is just old. Even when praised as a hero, he was always the old hero. I kinda see where this is going [...] All I'm saying is let's make this whole American Idol treatment process history as well. John McCain deserves better. And you know something, Barack Obama does too.

McCain Declared 2nd Worst Person in the World For Lies On Katrina Votes (MSNBC 06/05/08 8:57pm)

KEITH OLBERMANN: McCain asked by a New Orleans TV reporter about his having voted twice against the creation of a commission to investigate the levy failures around New Orleans. He denied this. "I've supported, my very dear friends, every investigation in ways to finding out what caused the tragedy. I've been as active as anybody in efforts to restore the city." Perhaps the Senator forgot his votes against establishing the Katrina Response in September of 2005 and again in February 2006. Responses to try to set up committees to investigate what happened to Katrina. Or his votes against financial relief for the victims in September 2005. Or the five months of additional Medicaid payouts from September 2005 which you voted against. Or his vote against the 28 billion emergency funding bill for Katrina victims in May 2006.

Maddow: How McCain Will Choose to Represent His Immigration Stance Still Unclear (MSNBC 06/05/08 7:00)
DAVID GREGORY: Does McCain have sway among Hispanics who remember his position and the break with his party on immigration, to really go toe-to-toe with Obama, who, by the way, certainly had some difficulties against Clinton in that voting group?

RACHEL MADDOW: Yeah, this is one of the thorniest and most fascinating issues that I think that we will be looking at as the campaign progresses because what does McCain say about immigration? Does he highlight the fact that he broke with Bush on this? That he did the immigration bill with Ted Kennedy? He did say then that he would vote against his own bill and that his mind was changed by republican anger on that subject. If he goes out and really tries to court the Latino vote, saying I'm a friend to the immigrant, he may be facing a republican insurgency on that issue. Because there's so much heat on that issue on the anti-immigrant side, on the anti-immigration side among republicans. I think, I have no idea what he is going to say about immigration but I think it's going to be fascinating to watch.

Lapid Accuses Netanyahu of Capitulating to Haredim

Yesh Atid Chairman Yair Lapid was angry about the agreement with United Torah Judaism party and accused Netanyahu of capitulating to the Haredim. "He is having a liquidation sale on everything that is important to the citizens of Israel," he said. "People will be able to continue to not recognize the state, to receive billions of shekels from the taxpayers and not work. Taken together, this is Netanyahu's shameful capitulation to political extortion by an anti-Zionist party that has lost all inhibitions because it knows that the prime minister cannot stand up to its pressure." Yesh Atid faction head MK Ofer Shelah added: "The coalition agreements with the Haredim can be called 'agreements to return the state to the dark-ages.' It is a sell-out."

The Cost of Haredi Demands: Four Billion Shekels

The overall cost of United Torah Judaism's demands comes to at least NIS 3.7-4 billion. The demand costing the most is to raise child allowances—this will cost approximately NIS 2.6 billion a year. The second costliest demand is the Haredi demand to cancel the cut to the budgets to support married yeshiva students who attend kollels [yeshivas for married students] (which was made under Lapid). This means an addition of NIS 500 million a year, so the overall budget for supporting yeshiva students will come to one billion shekels a year, and more. In addition to these two demands, there are four other demands with a high price.

Netanyahu Has Had It 'Up to Here' with Shas, Jewish Home

With less than a week to go before he is required to present a new government, or let opposition leader Yitzhak Herzog try, Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu is expressing frustration with potential coalition partners Aryeh Deri and Naftali Bennett. Likud sources said that Netanyahu is accusing the two of trying to "squeeze" him for concessions he cannot make; if this is how the government acts even before it is formed, the sources said, Netanyahu feels he would be better off forming a unity government with Zionist Union.

White House to U.N.: First Iran, then Mideast Peace

The United States has been privately leaning on France and other allies to hold off from pushing a measure at the U.N. Security Council that is designed to force movement on the stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace process at least until negotiations over Iran's nuclear program have concluded. The American pitch for a delay comes just weeks after French Foreign Minister Fabius announced that he would push in a matter of "weeks" for a new U.N. "parameters" resolution that would set a fixed timetable for negotiating a political settlement to the Israeli-Palestinian dispute.

Shapiro Noncommittal on US Veto of UN Draft Resolution

The United States ambassador to Israel refused Wednesday to commit to a veto of anticipated French backed UN Security Council resolution that would create a new international framework for resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and is likely to set a timeline for an Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 lines. In an interview with Army Radio, the ambassador, Dan Shapiro, said that his government was still in a "wait-and-see" mode given the Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has yet to create a coalition and the as-yet-formed government had not announced its policy with regard to the two-state solution. "We are waiting to hear what the new government's position will be, what will be its plan," he told Army Radio. "I think that the Israeli government will take into account its current international predicament."

Arch-terrorist Mohammed Deif back in control of Hamas military

Head of Hamas's military wing in Gaza, Mohammed Deif, was not killed in the assassination attempt made by Israel during Operation Protective Edge and is active once again. Deif has been active in strengthening the ties between Hamas and Iran, and has petitioned Iran for money and weapons. Furthermore, Hamas has been building new tunnels with cement that it purchased on the black market and has been manufacturing long-range rockets.

Jenin, once the 'suicide bomber capital,' a fragile transformation

It takes some time to accustom our ears to the loud, incessant soundtrack of voices and shouts. There are crowds of people and close to 180 market stalls, all of them loaded with the choicest fruits and vegetables. The new shopping center that opened just a few days ago has already become one of the most popular for the inhabitants of Jenin and for Arab citizens of Israel. This is, perhaps, the story of the "new" Jenin summed up in a few lines. It is no longer the city that Israelis feared from the second intifada. It used to be known as "the capital of the suicide bombers," the most dangerous place in the West Bank. But no one here talks about the intifada or "the war with the Jews" anymore. Everybody talks about salaries and money. The armed men are gone and more and more shopping centers are being opened in an effort to attract the (Arab) Israeli customers who come to visit. Saudi King Salman bin Abdulaziz Appoints New Crown Prince Saudi King Salman bin Abdulaziz on Wednesday sacked his younger half brother as crown prince and appointed his nephew, Deputy Crown Prince Mohammed bin Nayef, as the new heir apparent, state television said. He also appointed his son, Prince Mohammed bin Salman, as deputy crown prince, and replaced veteran foreign minister Prince Saud al-Faisal with the kingdom's Washington ambassador Adel al-Jubeir. In a decree published by state media, King Salman said he was following in the footsteps of his late brother, King Abdullah bin Abdulaziz, in seeking the most suitable candidate for the top jobs in the world's top oil exporter.

Netanyahu Secures 67 Members for Coalition

By Ben Caspit

Barring last-minute changes (a not uncommon occurrence in Israel), Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's fourth government will be sworn in next week. It will be a narrow, right-wing and ultra-Orthodox government, but with a solid majority of 67 Knesset members, hence its nickname: "the 67 government." This does not refer to the '67 border lines, but to the 67 Knesset members of the coalition from which this government will be assembled. Most of these Knesset members do not recognize the two-state solution and the 1967 lines; while these are viewed by the global community as the basis for all negotiations vis-à-vis the Palestinians, these Knesset members view them as fictitious.

This will be the first time that, in the current political era, an ideological right-wing government is established in Israel (with slight exceptions). Although the right has ruled Israel for several decades already (with short breaks), right-wing prime ministers were careful to establish balanced governments with representatives from center, or even center-left blocs. This was true for Ariel Sharon, when the Labor Party was part of his first government (2001-2003); for Netanyahu, whose 2009 government included Labor, too; and Netanyahu's 2013 government, which included Tzipi Livni, now co-leader of the Zionist Camp. This time, Netanyahu lacks any and all major fig leaves; he says that he is carrying out "the will of the voter." He promised an ideological right-wing government, and he is delivering on his promise. This is a dangerous experiment, the consequences of which are uncertain. It is a shame that such an experiment is being carried out on human beings.

Netanyahu went into this escapade joylessly. True, he swore never to betray his electoral base again, but he is an experienced politician who is familiar with the international arena. He would have preferred a more centrist government, with Zionist Camp leader Isaac Herzog as the key stabilizing force in it and the "official whitewasher" of Netanyahu's policies vis-a-vis the United States and Europe. And by the way, Herzog would also be happy to take this role, with the addition of an array of attractive portfolios and a respectable representation in the Cabinet and other policy-making forums.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ever since the elections, there were low-key contacts between Netanyahu and Herzog; messages were transmitted, proposals were exchanged, but neither side was ready to close a deal. Both of them, Bibi (Netanyahu) and Buji (Herzog), knew that if they joined forces immediately after the elections, it might be the straw to break the camel's back. Both of them had promised their constituents throughout the entire campaign that they would not sit together after the elections. For the first time in a long time, the Israeli public does not want a unity government. The internal opposition to unity, in the Zionist Camp as well as Likud parties, together with the fear of a harsh public backlash, is what prevented the current unity scheme from coming to fruition.

A source close to Netanyahu disclosed to me additional considerations of the prime minister. "Bibi knew that if he brought Buji into the government now, he would be living on borrowed time; the clock would start ticking toward the fall of the government.

If Herzog joined the government, an immediate rebellion would erupt in the Zionist Camp party, exactly as what happened to [former Prime Minister] Ehud Barak in his time, when he decided to remain in Netanyahu's government after the fall of [former Prime Minister Ehud] Olmert and the Kadima Party. The mutiny would have weakened Herzog and the odds were that he'd be beaten in the primaries, within 14 months. [The party's constitution requires that the primaries for electing the party chairman must be held no later than 14 months after the elections.] In such a case, Netanyahu's fourth government would disintegrate 14 months after its founding, if not earlier. The betrayed right would refuse to save Bibi again and he'd be dragged into elections again, under severe conditions.

"In this state of affairs," continued Netanyahu's associate, "Bibi preferred to first establish a narrow government as he had promised, and go with the flow. Meanwhile, Herzog will run in the primaries as a strong chairman of the opposition, and if he wins and gets another term of office, he could enter the coalition in another year and a half and save Netanyahu from the international tsunami that waits at his door. If Herzog is defeated, then Netanyahu continues in the current setup and hopes for the best."

This is the plan, in general terms. The principle is simple: Better to bring in Herzog after the Zionist Camp primaries, and not before. Until then, we can count on "the 67 government" to lose the last remnants of Israel's international legitimacy and start to collapse under external pressures. Under such circumstances, the Israeli public will be more forgiving should Netanyahu change the composition of his coalition to establish a unity government instead.

Let us not forget that 14 months, in terms of Israeli politics and Middle East events, is an eternity. In this time period, innumerable unexpected events and foretold catastrophes can pop up; thus Bibi's plan can go up in smoke at any given moment.

Meanwhile, let us focus on several personalities and alignments that will constitute the skeleton of Netanyahu's fourth government. The first is Kulanu head Moshe Kahlon, a former Likudnik who was tired with Netanyahu, resigned, founded an independent party and now returns as a strengthened, multi-jurisdictional Finance Minister. Moreover, no one, left or right, can form a government without him. Kahlon is, in essence, the new (Yesh Atid leader and former Finance Minister) Yair Lapid, but in contrast to Lapid he is an experienced, shrewd politician, realistic and calculated. He swore to learn his lesson from Lapid, who didn't know how to get the most from the 19 seats he raked up in the 2013 elections.

Kahlon already announced that he will do everything in his power to protect the Supreme Court, and has already managed to avert numerous legislative initiatives of Likud members against the Israeli High Court of Justice (Israel's highest appeal instance).

Though Kahlon is a Likudnik at heart, he holds moderate diplomatic views. In private conversations behind closed doors, he calls HaBayit HaYehudi Chair Naftali Bennett "an irresponsible hilltop youth." It is Kahlon who brings (Yisrael Beitenu leader and current Foreign Minister) Avigdor Liberman into the government on his back, and helps him entrench himself in the Foreign Ministry. Netanyahu toyed with the idea of giving Naftali Bennett the Foreign Ministry portfolio and swearing in a minimalist government of 61 Knesset members, without Liberman.

But Kahlon made it clear that he would not join such a government: As a finance minister who hopes to implement far-reaching reforms, the chances of getting them approved in a Knesset with a majority of only one Knesset member were infinitesimal. Under such circumstances, Bennett will have to make do with the education portfolio and Liberman will remain in the Foreign Ministry.

Will a political alignment form between Liberman and Kahlon? We will only find out after the government is sworn in. In the last two years, Liberman masqueraded as the responsible adult of the region. He held intimate, advanced negotiations with his counterparts in the Arab world (including such who do not have direct diplomatic ties with Israel), talked about a "regional arrangement" and put out fires in Washington. Before the elections, Liberman was forced to follow Netanyahu's footsteps and take a sharp turn to the right.

In the last election campaign, Liberman fought a dangerous slippery slope: The criminal investigation against his party's higher-ups that exploded just before elections seemingly eliminated his re-election chances. At the same time, Netanyahu's encroaching on his right-wing electoral pool, and the polls — which announced that Liberman would not cross the electoral threshold — kept harming him and robbing from him a great part of his electorate. Taking all of this into account, Liberman nevertheless succeeded in garnering six seats, proving that he still is a talented campaigner who has not lost his touch.

The question is what Liberman will want to be when he grows up: What Liberman will we find in the next government? A moderate Liberman-Kahlon axis could become Netanyahu's counterweight against the extremists in the Likud and the HaBayit HaYehudi parties. The Ultra-Orthodox Shas Party head Aryeh Deri is also viewed as a relatively moderate politician, one who expresses himself calmly, who understands the limits of power. It turns out that this future right-wing government of Netanyahu could also have its complicated nuances. Should external pressures on Israel be ratcheted up in a way that inflicts real harm on the Israeli standard of living, security or economy — this may extract different kinds of behaviors even from this government, different than what it currently plans.

The first harbinger of things to come in the coming year is US Undersecretary of State Wendy Sherman's statement April 27. She said, "If the new Israeli government is seen to be stepping back from its commitment to a two-state solution, that will make our job in the international arena [i.e., to protect Israel] much tougher."

IDF training to retake Gaza in possible future round with Hamas

By Elhanan Miller

Assessing that Hamas will continue to rule the Gaza Strip for the foreseeable future, the IDF is training for the possible reconquering of the entire coastal Palestinian territory in a future confrontation with the Islamic organization, the Times of Israel has learned.· Despite the harsh blow Hamas and Islamic Jihad sustained in Operation Protective Edge last July and August, Israel's military command is convinced that another round of fighting between Israel and Gaza is only a matter of time.

The Israeli leadership sees no prospect of the Palestinian Authority gaining control of the Strip, as it continues to demand, and would prefer to face a weakened Hamas than the anarchy of unruly organizations, some of which harbor extremist Islamist ideologies.

Hamas and Islamic Jihad lost 1,000 combatants in the 50 days of fighting with Israel, including many low- and mid-ranking commanders. The remaining 1,100 Palestinian fatalities in the war are believed to be innocent civilians caught in the line of fire.

Hamas had wanted to take Israel by surprise at the outset of last summer's operation by planning to launch a massive terror attack on an Israeli community near the Kerem Shalom crossing through a tunnel dug beneath the border. The organization's political leadership decided to postpone the attack, however, allowing Israel to strike first. That decision has bred a lasting crisis of faith between Hamas's military wing — which pushed for decisive action — and the more cautious political branch.· The rift between the two branches manifests itself in their preference of regional allies. While the military wing, headed by Muhammad Deif, opts for closer ties with Iran (which continues to fund it to the tune of millions of dollars in cash smuggled from Egypt), the political wing, led by Khaled Mashaal in Qatar, is vying for rapprochement with Saudi Arabia and Egypt.

Deif, who has survived numerous Israeli assassination attempts, continues to command Hamas's Izz ad-Din al-Qassam Brigades on both the strategic and tactical levels. Marwan Issa, a top commander of the Izz ad-Din al-Qassam Brigades, is emerging as one of the most powerful men in Hamas's leadership, serving as intermediary between the political and military branches.

Meanwhile, eight months after the ceasefire, Hamas has resumed tunnel digging in full force, employing over 1,000 diggers working in three shifts six days a week. The materials used for the tunnels include concrete bought on the black market, as well as wood and hard plastic.

In addition, it is training elite marine and ground forces, known in Arabic as Nukhba, and developing new drones and long-range missiles funded by Tehran.

On the Egyptian front, Hamas is helping to train offensive forces in the Sinai Peninsula to carry out coordinated attacks against Israel. While supplying arms and medical assistance to Islamic State operatives in the Sinai, Hamas strictly adheres to the ceasefire with Israel in Gaza, preventing rocket launches with forces deployed along the border.

Quoting a senior Egyptian security source, Palestinian Ma'an news agency reported on Tuesday that Egypt has begun to take more robust measures to prevent the digging of new tunnels from Gaza into Sinai, pumping water underground using 50 machines to flood the tunnels and cause them to collapse. Egypt is also expanding the current no-go buffer zone along its 13-kilometer (8-mile) border with Gaza from one kilometer to five. Within months, Egypt plans to dig a water canal from the Mediterranean to the southern tip of the Gaza Strip, hoping to eradicate underground tunnels once and for all.

According to Ma'an, Israel has also allowed Egypt to introduce heavy artillery and F-16 fighter jets into Sinai in its war on local terror cells, for the first time since the signing of the Camp David Peace Accords in 1979.

Israel understands that the key to lasting calm in Gaza lies with the combination of effective military deterrence and relative economic prosperity. With the Egyptian border closed indefinitely to Gaza, the impoverished, devastated Strip grows increasingly dependent on Israel for its sustenance.

The new Israeli government will soon be requested to allow in hundreds of day laborers from Gaza, for the first time in years, augmenting the recent license given for the export of agricultural produce.

Thank you so much. To the great Governor of Iowa and Lieutenant. Governor of Iowa. To my dear friend Tom Harkin for the outstanding work that he does. To the congressional delegation of Iowa that is doing outstanding work and to Nancy Pelosi , Madam Speaker, thank you all for the wonderful welcome and the wonderful hospitality.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.

This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.

I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

MSNBC: "For 2016 Democratic hopefuls, a delay of game"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

January 9, 2015, 2:39 p.m. EST

Democratic aspirants are taking a more leisurely approach to 2016, even as Republican presidential hopefuls are scrambling to lock down top political talent and raise campaign cash more quickly than their potential rivals.

Flashback to this point during the 2008 presidential cycle: Three major Democratic candidates — Tom Vilsack, John Edwards, and Dennis Kucinich — had already declared their candidacies, while announcements from Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton, Joe Biden, and Chris Dodd were coming right around the corner in later January. As compared to 2008, the field this time around could be best described as quiet, with most cooling their heels until spring.

The only candidate officially looking at a run right now is former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb, who announced an exploratory committee in November. But he's since gone dark, and hasn't made a public appearance since Dec. 3. And spokesperson says he will be out of commission for some time as he recuperates from knee surgery.

"Jim has just undergone a full knee replacement as a consequence of shrapnel wounds received from an enemy grenade," spokesperson Craig Crawford said Friday. "He is out of the hospital and recovering quite well. The upside is he can catch up with the new season of 'Downton Abbey.'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Webb served in Vietnam and received shrapnel wounds while shielding a fellow Marine during a daring maneuver, for which he was later awarded the Navy Cross.

Earlier in the week, Crawford told msnbc that Webb is in “merely an exploratory phase.” “Right now there are no events on the schedule. That will come if Jim decides to run,” he said.

Thursday night during an appearance at the University of Chicago, former Gov. Martin O’Malley said he is “seriously considering” a run in 2016, but added that he’s going to take the next few months to resettle his family after he leaves the governor’s mansion in two weeks. He told the Associated Press afterwards that he’ll make a decision on whether to run by the spring.

Back in Washington, Sen. Bernie Sanders — who has also said he is seriously eyeing a run — is busy with a new job in the new Senate, and so far has no political events publicly scheduled this month, a spokesperson said, though that could change going forward. He is scheduled to headline a progressive summit in Pennsylvania in February. Sanders previously said he’ll decide in March on a possible bid for president.

While the presumed front-runner on the Republican side, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, jump-started Republicans with an early declaration that he will explore entering the race, former secretary of state Hillary Clinton appears be aiming for a spring announcement date. “She’s the pacesetter in this thing,” veteran Democratic strategist Tad Devine, who is advising Sanders, told msnbc.

Clinton has two speeches sponsored by a bank in Canada scheduled for later this month, and two more private appearances planned for February and March, but so far nothing else has been announced publicly. Her plans as of now also don’t include public appearances in the key presidential race state of Iowa and New Hampshire anytime soon. “Things are pretty quiet in the near term,” said Clinton spokesperson Nick Merrill.

Nonetheless, there is plenty happening beneath the surface as Clinton quietly assembles a prospective campaign team.

Shortening the primary campaign in an attempt to run out the clock while in a strong position is a classic move for front-runners. But with Clinton leaving the field open, some Democratic operatives are puzzled as to why her potential rivals don’t seem eager to take advantage of the vacuum.

“For any of the candidates, time is the most valuable resource that they’ve got,” said John Davis, an Iowa native and former Edwards aide who went on to serve as chief of staff to Iowa Rep. Bruce Braley. “Activists and folks in Iowa are ready for candidates to get on the ground.”

O’Malley, like Edwards, deployed staff and money to early presidential states to help Democratic candidates in the midterm elections before their prospective runs. But Edwards made a point of keeping his operation in the state up and running, transitioning it into a presidential run, instead of closing down shop after the midterms.

While Webb has health reasons for staying off the trail, O’Malley on Thursday alluded to personal reasons relating to his family.

A lack of finances could also be a hindrance for some potential candidates, since deploying a campaign requires major resource commitments. Eventually, though, candidates will make it to the field.

“You can’t explore without leaving the house,” Davis said.

By Jonathan Martin and Nicholas Confessore

January 9, 2015

WASHINGTON — Mitt Romney, the 2012 Republican presidential nominee, told a group of donors in New York on Friday that he was considering running for president again next year, sending a signal to the party's financiers that they should not yet commit to Jeb Bush.

Meeting with about 30 contributors in the Manhattan office of the New York Jets owner, Woody Johnson, Mr. Romney said he was "thinking about it," according to Spencer Zwick, a longtime adviser who was at the meeting, first reported by The Wall Street Journal.

"Mitt is considering it because he thinks he can make a difference," said Mr. Zwick, who has been among the loyalists to Mr. Romney hoping he will pursue a third race for the White House.

Mr. Romney, a former Massachusetts governor, first ran for president in 2008. He had said repeatedly since his loss to President Obama in 2012 that he would not run again.

His apparent interest in another bid comes as Mr. Bush, a former Florida governor, has dominated the news with a series of steps toward a presidential run. He has started both a leadership political action committee and a "super PAC," and has begun traveling the country to meet with Republican contributors — including, this week, in the Boston area, for years Mr. Romney's home. Mr. Bush has also repeatedly criticized Mr. Romney's 2012 campaign in recent weeks.

Mr. Zwick said that Mr. Romney's decision would not hinge on who else was in the race, but he did acknowledge that Mr. Romney's comments on Friday could cause some high-level Republican donors to at least hold off on committing to Mr. Bush.

"If there are donors thinking in a vacuum, 'I'm with Jeb because Mitt is not running,' then of course they are now going to have more to think about," he said.

The two former governors are not close. Mr. Romney's loyalists have not forgotten that Mr. Bush did not endorse Mr. Romney's 2012 campaign until the latter half of March, when Mr. Romney already had a firm grasp on the Republican nomination. And Mr. Bush could barely conceal his dislike for how Mr. Romney handled the immigration issue in both of his presidential primary campaigns.

Mr. Zwick said that Mr. Romney would most likely have to make a decision "over the next 60 days."

Mr. Romney had told donors at past events, including one in Houston shortly before last year's election, that he did not intend to run again, but he did not rule it out. He told those supporters that he would run if it looked as though others in the Republican field could not win a general election, and if leading party figures encouraged him to enter the race.

Asked what had changed since those conversations, Mr. Zwick said, "He's looked at the landscape of issues out there."

The meeting on Friday, which included several people on a conference call line, gathered some of Mr. Romney's top fund-raisers and donors from the 2012 campaign, including Patrick Durkin, a managing director at Barclays Capital; the investor Julian Robertson; the hedge fund manager Anthony Scaramucci; the New York Yankees president, Randy Levine; and Edward Conard, a former executive at the private equity firm Bain Capital. Mr. Johnson, the Jets owner, remains uncommitted in the 2016 race and did not participate in the discussion.

Mr. Romney told the group that his wife, Ann, was increasingly in favor of a third presidential bid, although their sons had mixed emotions, according to people who attended. But he added that he believed he was "the best candidate, with the best solutions, the best ideas," according to one of the attendees.

Mr. Romney asked each person in turn what he or she thought of his chances. Some gently criticized the management of his 2012 campaign, guests said, while others encouraged him to run.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Zwick emphasized that Mr. Romney recognized how difficult it could be to run a third time. “That’s why he hasn’t announced anything,” he said.

[Subtitle:] How Romney got from 11 nos to maybe on the question of 2016 — and what he has to decide before he takes the plunge. “Can you imagine what Ted Cruz is going to do to Jeb Bush?” one Romney insider tells BuzzFeed News.

It wasn’t long after Mitt Romney tottered off the national stage in November, 2012, bringing an end — it seemed — to the long, tragic story of his political career, when Spencer Zwick started getting phone calls from conservative millionaires who were clamoring for one last sequel.

Zwick, the square-jawed finance wunderkind who masterminded the candidate’s phenomenally successful fundraising operation in 2012, had returned after the election to the private equity firm he co-founded with Romney’s son, Tagg — but Mitt’s network of GOP money men wouldn’t stop hounding him. Inside Solamere Capital’s pristine, white-walled offices on Boston’s trendy Newbury Street, Zwick often found himself on the phone with major Republican fundraisers, bundlers, and donors putting the same questions to him.

“I got calls from people every day asking, ‘Do you think he’ll do it? How can we convince him to do it?’” Zwick said in an interview with BuzzFeed News.

With Friday’s news that Romney told a group of donors he was now actively considering a third presidential bid in 2016, it appears the boosters have gotten through. “Everybody in here can go tell your friends that I’m considering a run,” the former candidate told the gathering in midtown Manhattan, according to Politico. But insiders who spoke to BuzzFeed News about Romney’s evolution on the 2016 question said he only began to entertain the possibility recently, and that he still needs to weigh a number of factors — including Jeb Bush’s electability — before he decides to take the plunge.

Zwick didn’t need donors to convince him that the ex-nominee should run again; as a longtime loyalist who had worked closely with Romney from the Salt Lake City Olympics to the Massachusetts governor’s office and beyond, he said he repeatedly urged his mentor to keep his options open after the 2012 election.

“My argument was that 60 million people already voted for this guy,” Zwick said. “He has the experience, he has the background, he has the skill set. My view is if we’re going to beat Hillary Clinton or Elizabeth Warren or whoever they nominate, we have to find somebody who can not only get through the primary, but who knows he can do the job. I don’t see somebody in the [Republican] field who has the skill set he does. My view is he has to do this.”

But despite all the cheerleading, Zwick said Romney was genuinely averse to the idea of a third run all through 2013 and much of 2014 — a sentiment that often came through whenever reporters asked him about his political future. For example, when a New York Times reporter interviewed him a year ago after the Sundance Film Festival screening of the documentary, Mitt — a sympathetic portrayal that did much to rehabilitate his image, at least in the political class — she asked whether he would run again. His response: “Oh no, no, no. No, no, no, no, no. No, no, no.”

Most political observers counted the nos (there were 11) and took the emphatic denial at face value.

"I truly think that it was never a thought that he would ever do it again," Zwick said.

But then, the midterm elections kicked into gear and Romney — who became an in-demand surrogate and fundraiser, stumping in races across the country — caught the campaign bug again.

"Through the 2014 elections, he spent a lot of time on the road talking to voters," Zwick said. "He was reminded once again being on the trail that there are a lot of really important issues facing the country and he has the skill set to solve them, and that has weighed heavily on him."

The midterms also corresponded with a wave of stories in the political press about a possible Romney 2016 bid, many of which originated with supporters who wanted to fertilize the speculation. It worked; the stories ensured that hopeful donors would keep calling Zwick and other people they believed to have Romney's ear, making the media predictions a self-fulfilling prophecy. Zwick said he couldn't point to one day or event that changed the ex-candidate's mind, but he eventually began to see more willingness on Romney's part to engage the idea.

Another former campaign adviser said Romney has been troubled by the Obama administration's foreign policy, and what he sees as the disastrous consequences of the United States shrinking from its role as international leader.

"Mitt has been waking up every morning watching what's happening to the world, and he's incredibly distressed," said the adviser, who requested anonymity to speak without Romney's permission. He added that the former candidate believes his widely mocked 2012 warnings about Russia being "our number one geopolitical foe" — along with other hawkish campaign rhetoric — has been vindicated by world events. "Mitt predicted everything."

As he weighs his choices in the coming weeks, Romney won't be deterred by which candidates enter the primary, or by any displays of fundraising muscle-flexing, Zwick said. Earlier on Friday, Bloomberg Politics reported that Bush's team set a fundraising goal of $100 million for the first three months of this year in an effort to scare off prospective primary opponents. (Bush's spokesperson said the goal came from donors, and that their actual target is "far more modest.")

But Zwick said fundraising is the least of their concerns.

"It's a primary," he said. "You go back, there's always been multiple candidates in the race that could raise money…. And he has actually already won a primary before."

According to one former adviser, the biggest political question Romney will be considering as he makes his decision is whether Bush will be able to make it to the general election.

"Look, Jeb's a good guy. I think the governor likes Jeb," the adviser said. "But Jeb is Common Core, Jeb is immigration, Jeb has been talking about raising taxes recently. Can you imagine Jeb trying to get through a Republican primary? Can you imagine what Ted Cruz is going to do to Jeb Bush? I mean, that's going to be ugly."

The adviser added that aside from Bush, Romney doesn't believe any of the Republicans in the field are ready to take on Hillary Clinton in the general election.

"He's not going to be intimidated by Bill Clinton sitting in the front row of a debate, looking at him," the adviser said of Romney. "His dad has run for president. He's run before."

Talking Points Memo: "A Deformed Woman: Hillary Clinton and the Men Who Hate Her"

Here's what happened the last time Hillary Clinton ran for president: she drove men wild. Well, certain men. Especially certain men on the right. You could recognize them by the flecks of foam in the corners of their mouths when the subject of her candidacy arose. And they're already girding themselves for the next time around, because there's something about Hillary that just gets them all worked up.

But what exactly? Despise her they do, yet they're also strangely drawn to her, in some inexplicably intimate way. She occupies their attention. They spend a lot of time thinking about her—enumerating her character flaws, dissecting her motives, analyzing her physical shortcomings with a penetrating, clinical eye: those thick ankles and dumpy hips, the ever-changing hairdos. You'd think they were talking about their first wives. There's the same over-invested quality, an edge of spite, some ancient wound not yet repaired. And how they love conjecturing upon her sexuality! Or lack of, heh heh. Is she frigid, is she gay? Heh heh. Yes, they have many theories about her, complete with detailed forensic analyses of her marriage, probably more detailed than their thoughts about their own.

My point is that you can tell a lot about a man by what he thinks about Hillary, maybe even everything. She's not just another presidential candidate, she's a sophisticated diagnostic instrument for calibrating male anxiety, which is running high. Understandably, given that the whole male-female, who-runs-the-world question is pretty much up for grabs.

As our tour guides into these subterranean psychical thickets, I've enlisted a selection of Hillary's right-wing biographers to lead the way, or more specifically, a selection of authors obsessed enough to write entire books about a woman they detest while still being lucid enough to find a commercial publisher. Unfortunately this excluded self-published works like Hillary Clinton Nude: Naked Ambition, Hillary Clinton And America's Demise by Sheldon Filger, but even the painfully repetitious title screamed for the interventions of a professional editor, and life is short. I also declined to read any books that came with voodoo dolls; sadly this ruled out The Hillary Clinton Voodoo Kit: Stick It to Her, Before She Sticks It to You! by Turk Regan, but as fuming tirades were in no short supply, I felt that I could afford to be choosy.

Biographies, even bad ones, are the record of a relationship: temporary marriages, so to speak. More than a few self-reflective biographers have admitted as much. And for whatever reasons, Hillary seems to attract a certain type of husband: guys with a lot of psychological baggage, emotional intensity, and messy inner lives.

Let's begin with Emmett Tyrrell, Jr., author of Madame Hillary: The Dark Road to the White House, since if Hillary's biographer-foes sound like embittered ex-husbands, in Tyrrell, founder and editor-in-chief of the far-right American Spectator, we're fortunate to have a biographer who's occasionally mused in print about his actual ex-wife. So who gets it worse—Hillary or the ex? Actually it's a toss-up. Who would have predicted: coincidentally it turns out that Madame Tyrrell and Madame Hillary share an uncanny number of similar traits. Hillary's a self-righteous, self-regarding narcissist, "a case study in what psychiatrists call 'the controlling personality," and assumes the world will share her conviction that she's always blameless. Compare with Tyrrell on the soon-to-be-ex, from his political memoir The Conservative Crack-Up: "She resorted to tennis, then religion, and then psychotherapy. Finally she tried divorce—all common American coping mechanisms for navigating middle age." When Tyrrell worries that suburban women will secretly identify with Hillary's independence and break from their husbands' politics in the privacy of the voting booth, clearly suburban women's late-breaking independence is territory he has cause to know and fear.

Hillary's disposition is dark, sour, and conspiratorial; she has a paranoid mind, a combative style, is thin-skinned, and "prone to angry outbursts." Whereas the ex-Mrs. T., we learn, was afflicted with "random wrath"; and as divorce negotiations were in their final stages, threatened to make the proceedings as public and lurid as possible. Hillary has "a prehensile nature," which makes it sound like she hangs from branches by her feet. (Tyrrell has always fancied himself a latter day Mencken, flashing his big vocabulary around like a thick roll of banknotes.) And while he nowhere actually says that his ex-wife hung from branches by her feet, the reference to protracted divorce negotiations probably indicates that "grasping"—the definition of prehensile (I had to look it up)—is a characterization he wouldn't argue with. When Tyrrell writes of Bill and Hillary that there was an emotional side to the arrangement, with each fulfilling the other's idiosyncratic needs, as we see, he's been there himself.

Threatening ex-wives, property settlements, bad breath—not exactly lighthearted stuff. Tyrrell at least tries to be amusing about it, in the sense that love transformed into hatred can be amusing, in a bilious, horribly painful sort of way. Not so with Edward Klein, author of the bestselling The Truth About Hillary, and a tragically humorless type. When Klein rants, "As always with Hillary, it was all about her," note the rancid flavor of marital over-familiarity—he's really just had it with her. He's practically venomous. Though he's also so suspicious of her sexual proclivities that unintentional humor abounds: he's like an angry Inspector Clouseau with gaydar. The inconvenient fact that there's no particular evidence Hillary bends that way dissuades him not.

Thus we learn that Hillary went to a college with a long tradition of lesbianism (Wellesley), where she read a lot of lesbian literature, and two of her college friends would later become out-of-the-closet lesbians, and later, some of her Wellesley classmates were invited for “sleepovers” to the White House? (Get it? Sleepovers.) In 1972, a Methodist church magazine she subscribed to published a special issue on radical lesbian and feminist themes edited by two—you guessed it—lesbians. In college, her role models were feminists who refused to wear pretty clothes, and sometimes appeared mannish; her White House Chief of Staff was also mannish looking. Though according to Klein, Hillary never much liked sex to begin with. Sounding like a Monty Python rendition of a Freudian analyst, Klein speculates about a fight Hillary once had with a college boyfriend about not wanting to go skiing; skiing, say Klein, “might have been a substitute for an honest discussion about her sexual frigidity.” The episode ended with Hillary retreating into “icy silence.” Get it? Icy. (He also quotes Richard Nixon, of all people, who says that Hillary is “ice cold.”)

Yet Klein reports that Hillary had a torrid affair with Vince Foster, the deputy White House counsel (and her former law partner) who later committed suicide. This would make her a frigid closeted bisexual adulteress, for anyone keeping track.

If it’s a handy truism that constant sexual innuendos mask a discomfort with sex, then Klein is one uptight dude. But there’s so much sexual angst among these guys generally, along with quite mixed feelings about the female body itself. When Klein writes of Hillary’s lower regions that though she’s “a small-boned woman from the waist up, she was squat and lumpy from the waist down, with wide hips, calves, and ankles,” the blatant bodily aversion in the phrase “squat and lumpy” isn’t just a disagreement with her health care plan. Klein’s concentration on Clinton’s physical appearance is so microscopic that you fully expect to turn the page and find an index of her moles, accompanied by a close reading of what they indicate about her moral insufficiencies.

None of this is exactly a testimonial to his deep self-acuity. Or very attractive propensities in a man, it must be said. Though maybe he’s unconsciously identifying when he writes that Hillary had “always thought of herself as an ugly duckling,” and particularly hated her body, which caused her to neglect her personal appearance as a young woman, and go around dressed like a hippie in shapeless clothes, and with hair that looked like it hadn’t been washed for a month. Or secretly commiserating about her feeling “so hopelessly unattractive that she did not bother to shave her legs and underarms, and deliberately dressed badly so she would not have to compete with more attractive women in a contest she could not possibly win.” I feel compelled to note, if we’re going down this path, that—having seen a few photos of the author—this is a man who can’t have felt entirely secure about his competitive mettle on this score either.

Hillary’s physicality really does loom large for her biographers. Tyrrell too spends many passages mocking her youthful hairdos, down to the thick eyebrows which once “would have collected coal dust in a Welsh mining village.” In other words, she’s an overly hairy woman, in addition to everything else. Hairdo, eyebrows—thankfully we’re not privy to data on the condition of her bikini line. Tyrrell sounds like an aspirant for the Vidal Sassoon endowed chair on the Clinton-hating Right when he concludes that Hillary’s “search for the perfect hairstyle has finally been resolved into a neatly elegant businesswoman’s coiffure” and that she “seems to have turned her hair into a major strength.” He also concedes that Hillary “flirts well” and has evolved into “a handsome woman.” Klein gets in a few digs on this point himself, as you’d expect, benevolently mentioning that Hillary’s the kind of homely woman whose looks have improved with age, then trotting out another anonymous medial expert to testify that she’s been “Botoxed to the hilt.”

No, Hillary doesn’t exactly elicit the best in her foes. On the sexual creepiness meter, Klein gets some stiff competition from Carl Limbacher, who writes for the far-right news outlet NewsMax and is the author of Hillary’s Scheme: Inside the Next Clinton’s Ruthless Agenda to Take the White House. Here’s another biographer a little too keen to nose out the truth about Hillary’s sexuality: Bill Clinton is a predator, Hillary digs it, and this is the key that unlocks her character. If Hillary didn’t literally hold down the victims while Bill did the deed, she was complicit nonetheless—“a victimizer who actually enabled her husbands predations,” since “a woman with half the intellect of Hillary Clinton would understand that she’s married to a ravenous sexual predator at best—a brutal serial rapist at worst.” At least he compliments her intellect. I’m dying to know what Limbacher imagines Hillary’s wearing when he fantasizes about her in the henchwoman-to-rape role—her Ilsa, She-Wolf of the SS outfit or the navy blue pantsuit.

As we see, the problem for Hillary’s biographers isn’t that a woman’s aspiring to be president—none of them mount an actual argument against women as presidential candidates. The problem is that Hillary’s a deformed woman. She’s a sadist, a victim, asexual, a dyke—maybe all at once.

Taking the measure of Hillary’s perverted femininity also preoccupies John Podhoretz in Can She Be Stopped: Hillary Clinton Will Be the Next President of the United States Unless… On the one hand, Podhoretz wants to like Hillary, even though he finds her tough to warm up to as a woman: she never figured out what to do with her hair and clothes, in his diagnosis, she isn’t a raving beauty, and her manner is almost pathologically unsexy. Interestingly, Podhoretz thinks this anti-feminine quality may actually work in her favor: being “neither girlish nor womanly” with a “hard to describe style” could be the perfect blend for the first woman president, he muses, since a president has to be a little scary, not seem emotional—basically she should be an unlikable bitch. “And Hillary is a bitch.” Feigning worry that saying this kind of thing makes him sounds sexist—while clearly admiring himself for saying it—he explains that a woman presidential candidate needs to show she can be manly, and if any woman politician can pass for a tough guy, it’s Hillary. This scares him, though in a sweaty, enthralled sort of way. Call him Mr. Conflicted.

But maybe inner maelstroms come with the territory when Mom is the ultra-conservative doyenne and fiery anti-feminist, Midge Decter, author of numerous books denouncing the women’s movement and the dupes who fell for it. Dad is the notoriously pugnacious neo-con, Norman. When

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Podhoretz says, incoherently, that Hillary had an “easy path due in part to feminism,” he sounds like the dutiful son, channeling Midge. What mother could ask for more? But things can’t have been easy for John: between the powerhouse mom, the romantic impetuosities and flip-flops, and the politically strange-bedfellows current marriage (though I’m sure they’re a lovely couple), Podhoretz has more than his share of family baggage when it comes to love and politics. As has Hillary herself, needless to say—in a better world the two of them could have a fascinating heart-to-heart on the subject.

Instead, Podhoretz spends a good chunk of his book proffering weird advice to Hillary on how to position herself to win the election, even while bashing her senseless at every turn. Example: to avoid being upstaged by Bill, Hillary should treat him “as though he were her father—there to provide her with emotional support and little else.” Here we pause to note that Podhoretz is someone whose career has always been upstaged by his more famous father. How can the reader keep her footing amidst this mad swirl of relatives, husbands, ambitions, and projections?

By the way, Emmett Tyrrell has some free advice for Hillary too: she should get herself a divorce, and pronto. Since Bill is not only goatish but also “ithyphallic” (I had to look that up too), Hillary could present herself to women voters as “a victim of the male penile imperative,” then start dating again. I imagine Tyrrell is so pro-divorce because his own life improved so dramatically following one, especially on the penile imperative front. His fans will doubtless recall Tyrrell’s bubbly reports about life as a swinging bachelor, picking up “terrific co-eds” at various right-wing think-tank shindigs, and not returning home alone. Yes, conservatives do score, as Tyrrell—who charges Hillary with having been too self-disclosing in her memoir, Living History—makes sure to let us know. His preference is for the “soignée” and “physiologically well-appointed,” though unfortunately one of his soignée dates is mistaken for a hooker when he drops by a conservative gathering at the Lehrman Institute on his way to Au Club, a then-happening Manhattan nightspot. (A friend explains that when a conservative shows up somewhere with a beautiful woman, he’s usually paying by the hour.)

Tyrrell has actually been quite the gallant about aging female Republicans in the past, waxing lyrical about right-wing sex kitten Phyllis Schlafly’s foxiness and Nancy Reagan’s large beautiful eyes, both of whom are perhaps a quarter century his senior—to which one can only say, “You go, Bob.”

But could he ever go for a Democrat? As most agree, Hillary’s aging well, and Tyrrell hasn’t been entirely critical. On the plus side, she reminds him of Madame Mao, the “white boned demon” who was never more dangerous than when wearing a seductive guise, and Tyrrell is on record as a man who likes a seductive guise. However, in an exceedingly strange passage toward the end of the book, we learn that Hillary’s ultimate dream is to be commandant of a “national Cambodian re-education camp for anyone caught wearing an Adam Smith necktie or scarf.” Or perhaps it’s also an extermination camp, since he adds: “Welcome to Camp Hillary. Please remove your glasses and deposit them on the heap. (Was that a flash of gold I saw in your teeth?)” Yes, it’s off to the killing fields for Tyrrell and his kind—having received her political education at the feet of Pol Pot, it’s definitely curtains for the bourgeois enemy once Hillary takes the reins. I think Tyrrell means all this to be witty. He concludes by telling readers he’s “taking the high road, since hatred is an acid on the soul.”

Here we’ve entered the realm of male hysteria, where reason and intellect go to die, though Tyrrell can be a hoot for those who find this kind of thing entertaining.

Speaking of male hysteria brings us to the case of Tyrrell’s protégé at the American Spectator, David Brock, and his biography, The Seduction of Hillary Rodham. After receiving a million dollar book advance to write a smear job on Hillary similar to the one he’d previously performed on Clarence Thomas accuser Anita Hill (Brock was famously the author of the “a bit nutty and a bit slutty” line about Hill), a strange thing happened when he tried to plunge the dagger again. Somehow he couldn’t. Sure there was the stuff about the 60s radicalism that Hillary never really abandoned, including a catty analysis of her college wardrobe. And like the rest, he spends pages enumerating her bodily crimes and misdemeanors: given her thick legs she adopted the sort of “loose-fitting, flowing pants favored by the Viet Cong” (just call her Ho Chi Rodham); along with these, she sported white socks and sandals (here, even I must protest), wore no makeup, piled her hair on top of her head, and “came from the ‘look-like-shit school of feminism.’” Even once ensconced in the professional world she cut a “comic figure” with her hair fried into an Orphan Annie perm and a “huge eyebrow across her forehead that looked like a giant caterpillar.”

But more of the time it’s an intermittently compassionate portrait of a gawky, brainy, well-intentioned Midwestern girl swept off her feet by a charismatic Southern charmer, who migrated to the backwaters of Arkansas—or Dogpatch, as Brock likes to call it—to advance Bill’s political fortunes, sacrificing herself and her principles for love. Bill repaid her by having sex with everyone in sight. But Hillary wasn’t a phony, and shouldn’t have had to play the part to advance Bill’s career, Brock insists—he even says that her physical appearance should never have become a political issue, notwithstanding the amount of time he devotes to cataloguing it.

One of fascinating aspects of Brock’s employment situation was that he happens to be gay and the Spectator happens to regularly fulminate against gay rights, as did his yappy boss Tyrrell whenever given the chance. When Brock speculates that Hillary might have been “perversely drawn to the rejection implied by Bill’s philandering,” willing to accept compromises and humiliation in the sexual arena because of the greater good she and Bill could together accomplish, Brock—who’d once thrown a gala party to celebrate the hundredth day of Newt Gingrich’s anti-gay Contract With America—could have been describing his own career arc too. The big problem for him was that he ended up identifying with Hillary when he was supposed to be vilifying her. Some mysterious alchemy took place in the course of his writing this book: instead of exposing Hillary to the world, she exposed Brock to himself. The result was a stormy break-up with his pals on the Right: he became persona non grata in his former circles.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But he and Hillary had some sort of imaginary bond, at least in Brock's imagination. He describes waiting in line for several hours at a bookstore for Hillary to sign his copy of It Takes a Village, and where he hoped to stage their first face-to-face meeting. The question on his mind, he confesses, is what she thinks of him. But when he reaches the head of the line, faces up to the real Hillary rather than the imaginary one, identifies himself and asks when he could have an interview, Hillary's wry reply is, "Probably never."

All biography is ultimately fiction," Bernard Malamud wrote in Dubin's Lives, his novel about a biographer. What would he have said about this motley collection of writers: all biography is ultimately a Rorschach test? The various Hillaries that emerge are fictive enough, yet clearly they have an inner truth for their creators. Each invents his own personal Hillary—from baroque sexual fantasies straight out of The Honeymoon Killers and girl-girl sexcapades, to big sis—then has to slay his creation, while paying tribute to her power with these displays of antagonism and ambivalence. They're caught in her grip, but they don't know why; they spin tales about her treachery and perversity, as if that explains it. Except that the harder they try to knock her off her perch, the more shrill and unmanned they seem.

Politico: "Mitt Romney says he's considering a 2016 run"

By Maggie Haberman

January 9, 2015, 4:42 p.m. EST

Mitt Romney told a group of longtime supporters on Friday that he is considering running for president, a major turnaround for a past GOP nominee who just a year ago categorically ruled out a 2016 run.

If he follows through, it would be Romney's third White House campaign, and it would shake up the already large field of Republicans eyeing the presidency. But even many Romney supporters are skeptical he will ultimately jump in and risk losing three times.

"Everybody in here can go tell your friends that I'm considering a run," Romney said at a private meeting in New York with about 30 former donors, according to one source.

The former Massachusetts governor, who was the Republican presidential nominee in 2012, said he had a number of ideas about how to help the country, and that one of the issues he'd like to address is poverty, two people on hand at the meeting said. He also pledged that if he does decide to join the race, he would run a much different campaign than he has in the past.

Romney's 2012 race was plagued by complaints about insularity and a lack of a clear, defining message beyond being the anti-President Obama. He was caricatured by Democrats as a cold-blooded jobs killer during his private equity days, and was never able to relate to voters.

The gathering was called a few weeks ago and was held in midtown Manhattan. Romney's remarks were first reported by The Wall Street Journal.

People on hand included financier Patrick Durkin, and Alex Nabab, both of whom have committed to former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who is also exploring a 2016 run, and were involved in events with him earlier in the week in New York City and Connecticut. That both are already on the Bush bandwagon underscores the challenge Romney would face in trying to ensure his donor network remains intact if he runs.

For Romney's former backers, the news wasn't a complete surprise. For weeks, he has been slowly ratcheting up his rhetoric in conversations. But his decision to informally test the waters came as Bush has dominated media coverage and donor interest for the last several weeks, including the two New York-area events. And a number of the attendees, who said they were invited to a confidential meeting with Romney and were given no heads-up that he would use the gathering to make a more direct case for himself, were frustrated to find word of it had leaked.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush has been moving to engage the extensive donor network that backed his father and his brother in their White House campaigns. That means that for Romney, the window is closing. One source close to Romney said he will likely decide within the next two months about his next move.

Romney allies and former staffers have spent much of the past two years lamenting that he should have won in his 2012 campaign against President Barack Obama. Romney also ran for the White House in 2008, but lost the GOP nod to Sen. John McCain of Arizona.

Just a year ago, in an interview with The New York Times, Romney ruled out a presidential run in a most emphatic manner: “Oh, no, no, no. No, no, no, no, no. No, no, no,” he said.

But Romney supporters have argued that there’s a clamor for people who would like to see someone emerge as a leader for the Republican Party during a particularly fractious time, and Romney recently began making clear to donors and supporters that such talk was affecting his thinking.

In addition, Romney told those gathered Friday that his wife, Ann, was now very encouraging toward his running again, a source said — a change from her past protests. The couple’s five sons, however, were split on the notion.

Bush’s decision to move quickly to draw a line in the sand was in part because of Romney’s overtures to donors. Bush allies had privately grown frustrated that Romney was freezing some donors who hoped he would launch a campaign of his own.

Bush announced in December that he is considering a 2016 run, and he has moved quickly since to set up a leadership PAC, dubbed “The Right to Rise” to accept donations. A super PAC with the same name has also been set up to help Bush.

The former Florida governor has repeatedly said he won’t make a stark pitch to the Republican Party’s more conservative base by bending his positions to appease voters. He also has lamented that no recent GOP nominee has tried to avoid taking positions to win over GOPprimary voters who are more conservative, stances that end up turning off general election voters.

Bush and Romney are looking to occupy the center-right establishment lane. A sprawling array of senators, governors and former officials who appeal to different segments of the conservative base are also in the GOP’s potential 2016 mix. Among those seriously laying the groundwork for a presidential campaign are Sens. Rand Paul of Kentucky, Marco Rubio of Florida, and Ted Cruz of Texas. Also a possibility is New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, would likely vie for the same center-right support that Romney and Bush would seek.

Romney drew flak for his overtures to the right in 2012, especially on the subject of immigration. Bush has criticized the way Romney allowed himself to be defined negatively by Democrats during that campaign. Democrats at the time cast Romney, who made a fortune in the financial sector, as a heartless businessman.

Romney, in turn, has argued privately that Bush, should he run in 2016, will face some of the same criticism over his own extensive business ties. Bush has recently taken steps to reduce his private sector links. And Bush allies privately point out that Romney made his business record as a private equity executive a centerpiece of his rationale for running, something the former Florida governor isn’t planning to do.

At Friday’s gathering, there was a consensus among Romney supporters that he needs to reintroduce himself to the voters, in a complimentary way like the video aired about him at the GOP convention in 2012. Romney responded by saying that the damaging portraits of him are now old news and therefore less harmful.

For Romney, the prospect of another campaign also is a potential boon to business: Many of his donors are also potential investors in his son Tagg’s firm, Solamere Capital.

But Romney, whose late father also ran for president, has dreamed of the White House for years.

His increased interest comes not just as Bush has been trying to seize the establishment lane, but as Hillary Clinton, the undeclared but overwhelming Democratic favorite, has seen her approval numbers fall in recent months.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "What the heck is Mitt Romney doing?"

By Chris Cillizza

January 10, 2015, 10:51 a.m. EST

Mitt Romney sent a very clear message to a group of major donors in New York City on Friday: I'm thinking about running for president in 2016. Then, as he knew they would, those donors spread that message to every media outlet in the country.

It's a stunning reversal from public -- and private -- assertions from Romney and his allies that, after two runs for president in 2008 and 2012, he was absolutely, 100 percent done with running.

And that reversal begs this question: What the heck is Mitt Romney doing?

Let's start by making clear what he's not doing: Running for president -- at least not yet.

No one -- not even those most bullish on the prospect of Romney, part 3 -- believe that Romney has made up his mind to run. But, it's clear he is more interested in the possibility of a race than he was even a few months ago and wants to preserve the right to make his own decision.

What he sees -- and wants to stop -- is the momentum in the major donor community toward former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who has been the most aggressive potential candidate in the 2016 field since the 2014 midterms ended. Bush, according to one report, has set a goal of raising $100 million over the first three months of 2015 in hopes of convincing lots of other candidates that making the race is a fool's errand.

By making very clear that he's on the fence about another race, Romney freezes some not-insignificant portion of the Republican major donor base -- especially in New York and New Jersey. Rather than signing on with Jeb in the next weeks or months, many of those money men and women will wait to see what Romney does before doing anything.

So, Romney is really buying himself -- and, whether intentionally or not, the rest of the potential field -- some time. He's taking the Bush pot off of boil and turning it down to simmer.

Which then raises this question: Why?

The simplest answer is because a part of Romney would still like to be president and he doesn't want someone else -- named Jeb Bush -- to foreclose that possibility for him.

Romney has not been shy -- privately but publicly reported -- that he has doubts about Bush's ability to win the Republican nomination and the lack of any other candidate in the GOP field who presents a real challenge to de facto Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton.

These two paragraphs from a Politico story by Ben White and Maggie Haberman back in December are telling:

"[Romney] has said, among other things, that Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor, would run into problems because of his business dealings, his work with the investment banks Lehman Brothers and Barclays, and his private equity investments.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"'You saw what they did to me with Bain [Capital],' he has said, referring to the devastating attacks that his Republican rivals and President Barack Obama's team launched against him for his time in private equity, according to three sources familiar with the line. 'What do you think they'll do to [Bush] over Barclays?'"

While Bush has drawn mostly positive attention for stepping aside from various corporate and non-profit boards in advance of his likely bid, a glimpse of the potentially problematic issues Bush will have to navigate as a result of his work -- on education policy among other things -- since leaving the governor's office in 2006 came out this week in a terrific story by WaPo's Lyndsey Layton.

Writing of the Foundation for Excellence in Education, Layton says:

"The foundation, from which Bush resigned as chairman last week as part of his preparations for a possible White House bid, has been criticized as a backdoor vehicle for major corporations to urge state officials to adopt policies that would enrich the companies."

To hear the Romney side tell it, his renewed interest in the race is entirely born from a selfless desire to see the party win back the White House after eight years in the political wilderness. While that's likely part of his reasoning, no politician -- or human -- acts for entirely selfless reasons. Ever. Romney came close to being president in 2012 and likely believes that armed with the knowledge he has picked up over his last two bids he would be able to get to the top of the mountain this time around.

To me, Romney remains an unlikely 2016 candidate. But, he clearly can't get the idea out of his head (and his heart) and so wanted to buy himself some time to make the decision on his own timetable. Mission accomplished.

Vox: "5 reasons every Republican is running for president"

By Andrew Prokop

January 9, 2015, 7:35 p.m. EST

One early takeaway of the GOPs invisible primary? A whole lot of people sure look like they're going to run.

On Friday, Mitt Romney told a group of donors that he was considering another run for president. Minutes later, a new report said Marco Rubio had gotten approval from his family for a run, and that he wouldn't be scared away by Jeb Bush's fundraising.

Earlier in the week, Mike Huckabee ended his Fox News show to explore a bid, Jeb Bush launched a fundraising operation, Scott Walker's hiring of a likely campaign manager became known, and Chris Christie reportedly decided to move up his timetable for an announcement. Rick Santorum and Rick Perry also said they were seriously considering running. Less plausible candidates like Ben Carson, George Pataki, and Carly Fiorina have previously signaled their interest.

Now, it's not certain that all of these people will end up running. And many of those who do could drop out well before the voting begins — there tends to be a winnowing of the field as some candidates fail to raise enough money and win support.

But unlike in 2011-2012 — when many potentially strong contenders shied away from a bid — Republican hopefuls seem to be much more eager to run this time around. Here are five reasons why.

1) Jeb Bush would make a weak frontrunner

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For most of 2014, there wasn't really anyone who could be deemed a frontrunner in the GOP field. With Christie sidelined by Bridgegate , Rand Paul still getting a mixed reception from the GOP establishment, Scott Walker busy with his own reelection, and Marco Rubio damaged by his support of the Senate immigration bill, there seemed to be a vacuum in the field.

Enter Jeb Bush. With an unexpectedly early announcement of an exploratory committee and an aggressive fundraising push that Michael Bender and Jonathan Allen of Bloomberg Politics describe as "shock-and-awe," he's inarguably made a strong debut and forced the other potential candidates to move up their timetables for running.

Yet Bush has been out of politics for eight years. His positions on immigration and education aren't popular with conservatives. And his last name could prove to be more toxic than GOP elites currently expect — in general election polling, or even in the primary. As Ben Smith argued, he might not be in touch with how the GOP has changed since the rise of the Tea Party — and might stumble on the trail. Bush has even said that a GOP candidate this year should be willing to "lose the primary to win the general" — and maybe he will! (The first part, that is.)

2) The eight-year itch

Since Harry Truman's presidency ended, there's only been one time where a party has held onto the White House for over eight years — the Reagan-Bush reign of 1981-1992. Democrats and their likely nominee Hillary Clinton would be attempting to match that rare streak.

But as Brendan Nyhan wrote at the Upshot, voters seem to get tired after eight or more years of the same party, in what political scientist Alan Abramowitz calls the "time for a change" effect. More and more voters start to think that the opposition should get a shot.

We've gotten some good economic news recently, and if that continues, any GOPcandidate will face a tough time winning in 2016. But the economy that year will matter much more than what's happening now, and we simply don't know what conditions will be yet. And, of course, Jeb's older brother won the presidency over Al Gore when the economy was quite strong, and when President Bill Clinton was much more popular than Obama is now.

3) The 2010 and 2014 elections helped expand the GOP field and embolden the party

The Obama midterm years have just been amazing for the growth of the Republican Party, so there are simply more credible contenders to go around. In 2010, the party elected a host of new governors, senators, and members of Congress including Rand Paul, Marco Rubio, and Scott Walker, as well as other potential candidates like John Kasich. (All but one GOP governor running again in 2014 won.)

Beyond that, the party was emboldened by its sweeping 2014 wins. With the takeover of the Senate and most state governments, conservatism seems to be on the ascendancy, and Democrats in decline. And the news has been dominated by crises all over the world, further feeding the sense that Obama has failed. Obviously, the 2010 GOP victories didn't lead to Obama's defeat in 2012. But many potential candidates feel like they've learned from Romney's mistakes — including Romney.

4) Non-serious candidates can become more famous by running

Some people run for president because they think they can win. Others run because it's an easy way to get the press — and your party's base voters — to pay attention to you. This is particularly true in our modern era of many televised debates and intense media coverage, and in 2011-2012 unlikely candidates like Herman Cain, Newt Gingrich, Michele Bachmann, and Rick Santorum all had their moments in the sun. A no-hope candidate can use this brief spotlight to push some preferred policy ideas, as Ron Paul did. He or she can also have more mercenary motivations — for instance, hoping that newfound fame will lead to a lucrative book deal or media gig.

5) They can all position themselves as an alternative to Hillary Clinton

The funny thing about Hillary Clinton being the overwhelming favorite for the Democratic nomination is that practically any Republican can contrast himself or herself to her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If you're a young and new candidate, you can point to Obama's defeat of Clinton in 2008, and argue you could do the same as the candidate of change. Why would the GOPchoose a candidate of the past when they could be the party of the future?

Alternatively, if you're an older, better-known candidate, you could make the case that Clinton is a formidable opponent, and that the GOP needs someone experienced and tested to take her on. If you're from a political dynasty, you can even argue that that won't hurt too much in the general election, since Clinton is too (sort of).

In the view of many, Clinton's past year showed off many of her weaknesses, and made clear that she's vulnerable. We'll see how that plays out — but for now, it's an argument for any Republican to jump in the race.

Slate: "The Warren Commission"

By John Dickerson

January 9, 2015, 5:32 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] In a new focus group, voters agreed about one thing: Elizabeth Warren is one of the most intriguing contenders for 2016.

When 12 voters gathered in Aurora, Colorado, for a political focus group on Thursday night, it wasn't surprising to hear them compete to see who could bash politicians more. "If we got rid of every member of Congress and elected new people tomorrow who had no experience, I don't think we could do any worse," said Charlie Loan, who voted for Mitt Romney in 2012. When the group was asked to come up with phrases members of Congress should wear on wrist bracelets, they suggested "Don't trust me, I lie," "Looking out for me," and "Two Faced."

But one politician escaped the voters' ire: Elizabeth Warren. Six of the 12 said they would like to have Warren over to their house to talk, more than any other possible 2016 presidential contender they were asked about. They said she was "down to earth" and "knowledgeable." When asked a separate question about which politician they would like to have live next door, they picked Warren over every other contender as well. Jenny Howard, an accountant with student-loan debt who voted for Romney in 2012 and Sen. John McCain in 2008, also liked Warren: "If she ran, she could be the next president because she is personable and knowledgeable and has a good handle on what's going on in the country."

Peter Hart organized this Colorado focus group. Hart, a Democratic pollster for more than 40 years, helps conduct the Wall Street Journal/ NBC poll and has been holding these kinds of sessions for the past four presidential elections. The focus group was the first of a series of such two-hour interviews of swing voters that Hart will do leading up to the 2016 presidential election, for the Annenberg Public Policy Center to track how voter sentiment changes.

These people do not represent metaphysical certitude about the country's political opinion—it's only 12 people after all—and we are still far from the next election so much can change, but they offer glimpses of the current stirring in the public. Their desire for change, concerns about the economy (despite news that things are better), and interest in a candidate who cares about the middle class have appeared consistently in polls and other voter forums.

The affection for Warren among the group of five self-described independents, three Republicans, and four Democrats may not tell us anything about the Massachusetts senator herself. It's possible that she is a vehicle through which they are signaling their desire for change, for something authentic and maybe new. Charlie Loan, an IT manager, says he voted the straight conservative line most recent election but he'd listen to what Warren had to say. "The little I have seen and heard from her, she seems genuine—people from [Oklahoma] usually are. Since she was formerly devoted to the Republican Party, maybe she fits in the middle somewhere, which is where I would like to see most of them be. She is clearly well-educated and seems level-headed."

If Warren is a possible vessel for change, so too is Sen. Rand Paul, who several of the conservatives found intriguing. (Sen. Ted Cruz wasn't mentioned, even though he, like Paul and Warren, is also trying to position himself as an outsider on the inside.) Paul had a bit of the crossover appeal that Warren had. “He’s a reasonable choice,” said Andrew Regan, who described himself as a strong Democrat. “I would consider him, but I don’t know who the Democratic nominee is going to be.” Regan was emblematic of the strong desire for something new. Despite his ideological affiliations, he was happy to see Republicans in control of Congress. “I’m happy to see that Republicans took Congress. Instead of a ‘Do Nothing’ congress we have a ‘Do Something’ Congress.”

Once a Democratic nominee is chosen, it’s almost certain that Regan, a self-employed beekeeper, will vote as he always has. That’s what voters usually do. The same is true with conservatives who express an openness for Warren. But Warren’s authenticity, anti-corporate message, and outsider status all reflect the desire for change that came across so clearly from most of the participants.

The 2016 contenders who didn’t fare well are also two of its marquee names: Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush. Six of the 12 said they would back a law to bar all Bushes and Clintons from running. “He’s running off the Bush name and thinks that’s something,” said Howard. In a free-association exercise, the words people used to describe Bush included: “joke,” “no thank you,” “clown,” “interesting,” “don’t need him,” “intriguing,” “greedy,” and “bad scene.” (By contrast, Paul was described as “entertaining,” “interesting,” “very intriguing,” “honest,” and “freedom.”) Mention of Hillary Clinton conjured “hopeful,” “crazy,” “strong,” “spitfire,” “don’t like her,” “untrustworthy,” “more of the same,” and “next candidate, please.” Although the antipathy toward Bush and Clinton was often specific, it also could be read as a broad dislike of American politics today.

Not surprisingly, the economy was the issue everyone was most concerned about. Jobs numbers were solid again on Friday and the unemployment rate is at 5.6 percent (lower than Mitt Romney said it would be under his administration by the year 2017), but the good numbers didn’t do anything to assuage the participants’ worries. Though they said lower gas prices have helped, most were skeptical things were genuinely getting better.

“It’s nice to have the extra money,” said Susan Brink, a 56-year-old independent who voted for Barack Obama. “But I do kind of feel like they give us a little bit to make us happy, and then they take it away.” Rick Lamutt, a right-leaning independent who works as “a cable guy,” said that despite the good numbers, he sees the truth of the real economy in all the houses he visits where family members are moving in together and struggling to make do. “The simple fact is, regardless of what the numbers say, there’s a lot of hurting people out there,” he said. “You’ve seen on the news, ‘Everything’s fine, the economy’s great, there’s jobs everywhere!’ Well, if you want to make $9 an hour, you can go get a job, but if you want to make a wage that can support your family, good luck.”

This pervasive feeling of economic insecurity drove what these voters are looking for in candidates, too. Kimberly Tyler, a 61-year-old veterinarian, wanted a candidate who understood the pinch of the middle-class lifestyle. “Most in politics have money and it’s a money game for them and they don’t relate to the middle class, and everyone in the middle class is hanging on by their fingernails.”

There’s a long road before the election and while these views give us some idea of the mood, it’s important to keep in mind that even these voters are a long way off from drawing any real conclusions about specific candidates. Hart asked everyone to place themselves at a racetrack that showed how far along they were in their thinking about the next presidential contest. Most said they were in the parking lot. One woman said she was in her car taking allergy medicine—she said she was allergic to both horses and politicians. When asked whom she’d like to see in the race, she replied, “Superman.” But he hasn’t even formed a leadership PAC yet.

Main Topics: Houses Gaffe, VP speculation, POW Status, Withdrawal Timeline

Summary of Shift: The speculation over who will be Obama's running mate dominated the day. Presently, all major news networks are reporting the name of the VP will be sent out via text message shortly after 10:00 am Saturday morning. While most of the coverage has been positive for Obama, there were segments questioning Hillary Clinton's loyalty to the Democratic nominee and whether there will be tension at the convention. The houses gaffe is still in the news, with McCain surrogates firmly on the defensive. However, on balance, running mate speculation has been the news item most talked about during the evening.

Nonpolitical news included the unfolding controversy over the age of Chinese Olympic athletes, Russia not fully withdrawing from Georgian land, Tropical Storm Fay, and stories about a decrease in Americans traveling and driving this year.

Politico Reporter Offers Fair Reasoning For Questioning McCain And Offers Why The Issue Is Important; Ingraham Goes Ballistic (FNC 08/22/08 8:10pm)

EAMON JAVERS: I mean obviously it's not a set up. Obviously it' a fair question to ask of a Presidential candidate. My colleagues at Politco who asked him that you know I know we've been looking at the property record. It is some what difficult to figure out how many properties John McCain owns because a lot of the properties are owned by different corporate entities, not just the McCain personally. So, you have to really wade through the paper work and there has been a real open question of how many properties do the McCains actually own. [...]

LAURA INGRAHAM: Here's my take on this. My take is John McCain isn't really obsessed with how many houses he has or how many houses his wife was able to buy because her family did really well with this beer distributorship. They have a lot of money. He's not obsessed with it. And I were John McCain, I would have said you know something, we have a number of properties and my progrowth economic plan is going to help more people do better so maybe someday they might have a second home. Celebrating success, that's what he should do. I wouldn't have shied away from it. I wouldn't look defensive about it. I'd say I'm pushing progrowth policies, what are you doing Barack?

BYRON YORK: I dont think the response was particularly good [...]

JAVERS: This is a problem for John McCain on two levels I think. On the first one, McCain's been out there trying to portray Barack Obama as an elitist and his answer here stumbling around a question almost every American would immediately know the answer to in their own lives - I know how many houses I own - that's going to make him unable to go after Obama as an elitist.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

INGRAHAM: [...] That opens the door back to the cultural disconnect Obama is clearly demonstrating now with his little bit weakness in the polls now. I mean this thing is very tight. I think ultimately people see John McCain as someone who sacrificed for his country and who's going to begrudge him that he's in a family now that did really well. I think a lot of people say good for them.

Raddatz Questions Gibbs About Whether McCain's Success is a Problem (FNC 08/22/08 1:46pm)
MARTHA RADDATZ: Over the past couple of days we've seen a lot of back and forth over this issue of how houses John McCain has; and then he came back with, you know, Barack Obama has a million dollar house in Chicago, and all the other stuff that was put with that. Is this a good place for the discussion to be right now? Are you guys wishing that you hadn't gone there with this?

ROBERT GIBBS: Look, the person who went there was John McCain with not being able to remember whether he has 4 houses, 7 houses, 8 houses, 12 houses. It's like wheel of fortune. Spin the wheel and figure out how many houses John McCain has. But it speaks to something much larger.

RADDATZ: That doesn't really matter though, because a lot of people in this country say, you know, well, success is a good thing. His wife's family ran a great successful American business, He's just saying, we own a lot condos and it's a real estate investment. I wanna check on it so I can give you the right answer.

RADDATZ: Success is a wonderful thing. I'm not sure, yet , we 've gotten an answer from the McCain campaign. But what it speaks to is something larger. If you can't remember how many homes you've had, you're so out of touch, you can't even begin to relate to the family that just has one home, and is working every day, night and day to write a check to keep that home. Not to have it foreclosed on to create good jobs, to cut healthcare costs. It's about being out of touch, the same old policies we've had for four years. More of the same George Bush policies that have taken this economy downward […] And that's what we're seeking to change in this election.

MSNBC: Matthews Debates Whether McCain is "Elitist" or "Incompetent"
Chris Matthews Debates whether McCain is being "Elitist" or "Incompetent" (MSNBC 08/22/08 7:20pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: […] That ad wasn't just about a guy who's out of touch economically. That's an ad about a competency test. When a person comes to after a stroke, […] they say 'What's your name', 'Where do you live', right? 'How many houses do you own' is in the category of a competency test. And they know what they were doing in that ad.

DEL WALTERS: […] And I think they're also trying to tell you in that ad, by showing him with George H.W. Bush, that he is older than Obama; that he is not only stumbling on the issue of how many houses he has. And think about what we're saying when we say in that ad , everyone knows how many homes they own; everybody should know how many homes they own; everybody should know how many investment properties they own.

MATTHEWS: […] If you're a guy with a lot bucks, like their family, and you've got a home (s) that you've invested in, that's one thing; when you ask many homes you own, that's a particular question, how many places do you live?

CHARLES MAHTESIAN: Well, that's why it's so deadly. I mean that's why it's lasted for a few days, and why it happened on Wednesday and now we're still talking about it on Friday.
MATTHEWS: Well, we love the story because we can understand it. This is a story that we can get our brains around.

MAHTESIAN: Right. And that's what makes it so toxic for the McCain campaign. Think about all the traction he was getting. Great traction, different states, and swing states […] gaining momentum, and all of the sudden boom, he's stopped by this story because it plays into the argument-

MATTHEWS: Does this play into more subtle questions like, he didn't know there's no longer a country named Czechoslovakia, he thought there was an Iraqi/Afghanistan border, when in fact there's a country called Iran in the middle. There's things that he doesn't know that seem to be evidence of inattentiveness.

WALTERS: No, I think what's happening is we're finally seeing […] reporters vet John McCain. […] What we've seen in this campaign so far is John McCain being on the offense in regards to Barack Obama. Now we're seeing reporters say, now wait a minute, what are his leadership capabilities? How good would he be on the economy?

MATTHEWS: Is this where we're headed- knowledge questions? Jeopardy?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MAHTESIAN: This isn't really about competence, though, that's only a small part of it. What this is really about is the elitism issue. That's much more deadly. […] In fairness to McCain though, technically he doesn't own any of his houses.

MATTHEWS: So if he calls up Cindy and says, where are you? And she says, I'm home, where's that? You mean he doesn't have any idea where they live? Homes mean where you live. So if you call home, where are you going to be tomorrow, well which house? There's seven of them. What are they, bedouins? Do they move around among their seven houses?

MAHTESIAN: […] We found there was eight when we looked. The campaign said it was four, the Obama ad said seven, we found eight. Maybe there is ten.

MATTHEWS: But they all have pajamas in them and toothbrushes. […] Are they those kinda houses or are they investment properties?

MAHTESIAN: Where, they're condos, many of them, except for the ranch.

MATTHEWS: You've spoken with authority, here. You believe he has eight houses, he stays in periodically.

MAHTESIAN: I don't know have often stays there. Political analysis, property tax records, and other records show there were eight properties that he own, at least five of them were condominiums.

WALTERS: But Chris, here's the bottom line, 22,000 people lost their homes in Prince William County, Virginia this year alone because of foreclosure. If you're one of those 22,000 people who lost your home, who may have had a job, and then face foreclosure, and you hear a candidate say, I don't know how many homes I still have, that is not a popular-

MATTHEWS: I think you and I agree that they're working on the senior moment stuff here […]

Olbermann on McCain's Overuse of POW Status (MSNBC 08/22/08 8:40pm)
KETIH OLBERMANN: Since the day he decided to start talking about it, nine years after returning from Vietnam, John McCain has not stopped talking about it, envoking his years in captivity when accused of carpetbagging during a race for a house seat in Arizona, more than a quarter century ago. "As a matter of fact, when I think about it now, the place I lived longest in my life was Hanoi." Most recently, shielding the senator from criticism about his own home ownership ignorance, flack Brian Roger […] "This is a guy who lived in one house for five and a half years—in prison." […] Has McCain turned his POW status from insulation to excuse? Now one veteran, who served 31 years in the army, fighting in Korea and in Vietnam: "It's time for the senator to stop cheapening the experiences of thousands of vets and his fellow POWs, and his own as weel, by stretching the boundaries of logic to make his POW status a wild-card rebuttal to all accusation or an answer to all difficult questions. When he uses his status as a veteran to deflect legitimate questions and concerns, it devalues not just his service to our country but ours as well." […] And after Elizabeth Edwards noted how McCain gets government health benefits during a rebuke of his medical care policy, McCain insisted he was familiar with inadequate care "…from another government".

PAUL RIECKHOFF: He's definitely using it as a political shield for just about everything. He's used it for his marital woes, […] his inability to recall exactly how many houses he has. Everybody respects John McCain's service. Everybody knows what he's gone through is unimaginable to most folks. But not every POW in necessarily qualified to be president. And it's not a political shield for every screw-up he has between now and November. And I also think it gives him an opportunity to talk about veterans' issues in a very specific way. And he hasn't done much of that. He hasn't taken it to that next step, and I'd like to see him do it.

OLBERMANN: […] The stuff as shield is one thing. He's also used it to validate his policy decisions and create this aura about himself that he knows best in terms of anything military, thus, almost anything international. What kind of problems does that line of thinking create?

RIECKHOFF: I think it creates a number of problems. It was important to bring up the fact that he does receive veterans' benefits, he also went to school on the government's dime. He went to the Naval Academy and he opposed the G.I. Bill for basically a year of process.
Recently he's been trying to take credit for that as well, and that's just not true. He's tried to push this argument that he was holding out for transferability; transferability was always in the law. Could have been enacted by the secretary of the Army, Navy; and Senator Webb offered to include transferability; so did Senator Warner. […]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

OLBERMANN: What does being a POW merit in this political context?

RIECKHOFF: I think it shows his toughness, his love of country, shows his fortitude. […] There's another aspect to this. He was imprisoned and tortured for five and a half years. He has a tremendous opportunity to talk about mental health issues. To talk about post-traumatic stress disorder. Something that's facing hundreds of thousands of veterans who are coming home from Iraq and Afghanistan. And I'm a bit bothered by the fact that he can't tell you if he has seven or eight houses. Because there are 150,000 veterans in America right now who have a total of 0 houses, because they're homeless. […]

OLBERMANN: And this latest hint during the week about the draft […] does that make vets shudder?

RIECKHOFF: […] I think the draft has become a politically radioactive issue for everyone, but a lot vets want to see a draft. […] I hear from a lot of friends who are going over for a third and fourth tour, and would like to see everyone else in America put something on the line. I think the reality is our current pace of operations is unsustainable. You've got more than half a million people who've deployed more than once; our military is overextended, our national guard has been run into the ground.

CNN Highlights McCain As Opposing Bush White House, Obama, And Iraqi Government On Iraq Timeline For Withdrawal (CNN 08/22/08 6:10pm)
BRIAN TODD: Even the Bush administration has come around to a timetable for withdrawal they say, and McCain's the only one who hasn't. Obama has long favored a timetable. His is quicker. Withdrawal within 16 months from when he'd take office. McCain's supporters say far from isolating him, this agreement justifies a stand he took when it wasn't possible.

LESLIE SANCHEZ: He was one of the people who said the surge was necessary. And it plays very much to the fact that his strategy worked. And in essence it was trying to create the stability and security in Iraq so that U.S. forces could come home sooner.

TODD: Still, McCain's aides say he's sticking to his position against what they call an artificial timetable with a date certain. So whose really got the advantage in this deal? Analyst who don't take a position say it all may depend on whether this agreement resolves the Iraq issue for voters.

LARRY SABATO: What voters are thinking on Iraq it may play to McCain's strengths. If they are thinking about the economy, it will almost certainly play to Obama's strengths.

Jindal Churns Out Standard Talking Points (FNC 08/22/08 4:47pm)
BOBBY JINDAL: Let's be clear I don't think the Vice President is going to influence most voters. You've got a candidate that is so different on the issues. Senator McCain wants to cut our taxes, Senator Obama wants to raise taxes on Social Security, on families making over $42,000, he wants to raise taxes on investors, on seniors, on so many different people. On energy independence, Senator McCain wants to drill for oil and gas. He wants nuclear power, conservation, clean coal, renewable. Senator Obama has said he wants to raise taxes on coal, natural gas. He doesn't want to drill for gas. He doesn't think nuclear is the right answer for America. On national security, Senator McCain made it very clear he stands for our nation's interests, he stood firmly when Russia invaded Georgia, so I think you got a clear contrast between these two candidates.

Jindal Dismisses McCain Houses Gaffe; Asked About Removing Anti-Discrimination Ban in Louisiana (CNN 08/22/08 4:40pm)
GOV. BOBBY JINDAL (R), LOUISIANA: Wolf, thank you for having me.

BLITZER: I'm tempted to ask you, how many homes do you own?

JINDAL: Well, my wife and I have one home. I don't know if we own it or the bank owns it. But there's still a pretty good-sized mortgage on it. We have got the one house.

BLITZER: Well, I have been to your house and the governor's mansion in Baton Rouge. That's a -- and that's a pretty nice house that you don't own, the people of Louisiana own, but you live there.

JINDAL: Right. And we tell the kids every day, don't color on the wall. You know our kids are young. They're 6, 4 and 2. We tell them, you can't color on the walls. This is the people's house. You can go home and color on our walls, but not these walls. You're right. It is very nice. It is the people's home.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BLITZER: How big of a problem is this for John McCain, that he didn't know how many homes he and his wife owned? Because the -- the impression you're -- you get, that he's out of touch, he doesn't know, he's an elitist. What do you think?

JINDAL: I think the whole thing is silly. Look, the polls are tightening up. Senator Obama told us he was going to be a different kind of candidate. I think this is the kind of silliness voters just laugh at. It gave Senator McCain the chance to point out that Senator Obama earned $4 million last year, had the help of a convicted felon to buy him home. But, at the end of the day, none of that matters. The real issue for American voters is, how do they keep their homes? They're worried about the mortgage crisis, the financial turmoil in the markets, what they're worried about. And I think that the reason many of them will vote for Senator McCain is, he wants to cut their taxes. He wants to lower energy prices. Senator Obama, on the other hand, wants to raise taxes in many different areas, on energy, doesn't want to do more domestic production, doesn't like coal, natural gas, or nuclear energy. So, you know, it's an entertaining dustup, but the reality is, I think this is what turns people off of politics. They look at both parties in Washington and say, stop playing gotcha. Stop throwing mud. What we really want to know is, what's your plan to help us buy and afford our own homes?

BLITZER: Because Senator Obama says he wants to cut taxes for the vast middle class out there, and only raise taxes on those making more than $250,000 a year, and that he claims that Senator McCain wants to cut taxes for the very, very wealthy.

JINDAL: You know, the funny thing with Senator Obama is, I'm having a hard time keeping up with what his tax positions are. He voted, as you know, for the Democratic budget, which would raise taxes for those families, those making $42,000, which isn't wealthy the last time I checked, individuals. He also said at various times he wants to raise taxes on investors, on dividends, capital gains, Social Security. He's wanted to raise taxes on coal and natural gas. That impacts all of us that use those -- those forms of energy. Now, I have seen that it has shifted from the top 1 percent, 2 percent, 5 percent. Taxes would start now, 10 years from now. What's clear to me is, he had dozens of chances to vote to lower taxes while in the Senate, in Congress. He didn't do that, over 90 times, didn't vote to cut taxes when he could have or vote to stop taxes from being raised. Those are the issues. That's the debate we need to have.

JINDAL: And if he wants to explain his record differently, have that discussion. Don't get into this nonsense or silliness about going after each other's names or -- or gaffes. That's not the debate we need or deserve as a country.

BLITZER: Let me ask you for a quick explanation. It's a big story in Louisiana, in your state. You're not going to extend anti- discrimination law in your state that would bar discriminating against all sorts of people, including gays and lesbians. And that's causing quite an uproar. Your predecessor, Kathleen Blanco, approved that legislation four years ago. You say it's not necessary. But there are -- there's a lot of an anger on this issue right now. Why don't you want to keep this law in effect?

JINDAL: Well, three things. One, it should be no surprise. We said when she issued the order in '04 and again as a candidate for governor, we weren't going to renew the order. We expressed our concerns back then. It was -- "Times Picayune" did a big story about it in October of last year during the race. Secondly, we strongly oppose discrimination in any form. And I think we have got good strong state and federal laws that prohibit that. But, thirdly, our -- one of our main concerns with the executive order, really, what we don't want is to create special classes, special rights. But we also are worried about the impact on faith-based groups. Many faith-based groups have said this would interfere with their ability to partner with the state, especially the Department of Health and Hospitals. We have seen in Louisiana the great role of faith- based groups, especially after Katrina and Rita. For those reasons, we said, we don't see the need for the executive order. But let me be clear. As the governor of Louisiana, we will not condone any form of discrimination. We condemn it. We oppose it. We have got good, strong state and federal laws to prohibit it. For that reason, we didn't think it was necessary. Now, all of her executive orders, by law, expire today. So, it's not that we -- we basically aren't writing a new one to extend it, because all of her executive orders, by law, expire today.

Marco Rubio Would Reopen Gitmo, Reverse Obama Foreign Policy

Apr 13, 2015, 5:30 PM ET

via WORLD NEWS

Sen. Marco Rubio 's foreign-policy platform has a theme: undoing some of President Obama's biggest decisions.

That would include reopening the military prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba , if Obama succeeds in closing it as the president promised at the outset of his first term in the White House.

"Absolutely," the Florida Republican said when asked whether he would reopen the prison in an exclusive interview with ABC's George Stephanopoulos, his first as a presidential candidate.

"Here's why," Rubio continued. "We no longer, on an ongoing basis, detain terrorists , and so we're not getting interrogation. They're killed by a drone, or they're targeted in some other way, but there's tremendous value in capturing people that are enemy combatants and, from them, being able to gather actionable intelligence that can not only prevent attacks against the homeland and abroad, but allow us to disrupt their cells that they've created in different parts of the world."

Rubio, who publicly announced his 2016 run for president in the exclusive ABC interview, had previously supported keeping the prison open. Home to military detainees from the U.S. "GlobalWar on Terror " from the George W. Bush presidency, Obama has sought to transfer detainees out of the prison but has struggled to close it despite his pledge to do so.

Rubio also vowed to reverse course on Obama's recent diplomatic endeavors with Iran , with which the United States is working to finalize a nuclear pact, and Cuba, with which Obama has opened diplomatic relations.

"I think from a national-security perspective, this deal with Iran is an extremely dangerous one," Rubio said when asked what he would do on his first day as president. "I think the next president of the United States is going to have to deal with that on day number one."

Of the diplomatic opening with Cuba, Rubio said, "I would reverse every single one of the Subject: Earned Media Update

Hello All – Two quick things.

1) As you may have seen, ABC News reporting that Speaker Boehner and Republicans in Congress are pledging more investigation into Secretary Clinton on emails. Below are the key points we're sharing with Hill allies and TV surrogates this afternoon to get ahead of it and frame it as crazy GOP investigations AND GOP hypocrisy. We're trying to push folks to go after them.

2) Everyone asked on our last Comm call for more offense against GOP. While we can't do it perfectly before campaign is launched, we've had some success working with partners getting stories on Jeb and others. Clips attached.

Thanks. We'll try to keep these Earned Media Updates as often as we can.

POINTS

While it was permitted for Secretary Clinton to use one blackberry instead of two, looking back she's said it would have been better for her to use two. At the time, this just didn't seem like an issue. She's asked State Department to publicly release all of roughly the 55,000 printed pages of emails she provided them.

Secretary Clinton was the first and only former Secretary to respond to the Department's request last year, and was the only one to provide her work emails.

Secretary Clinton has asked the Department to make her work related emails publicly available, and just like every other Cabinet Secretary and U.S. government official, she gets to choose to keep her personal emails private.

Charlie Cook wrote that: "This is the classic kind of inside-the-Beltway, process story that politicos and reporters get in a lather over, but that resonates very little with average voters."

This isn't about emails, it's about Trey Gowdy furthering a partisan witch-hunt and Republicans in Congress distracting from their dangerous letter to the Iranian regime. There have been nine different Congressional committees that have held hearings on Benghazi . Secretary Clinton spent more than five hours testifying before the Senate and the House of Representatives and participated in briefings for Members.

Gowdy has been criticized for subpoenaing the State Department for emails already turned over to the Select Committee.

Gowdy and Republican have been caught numerous times trying to use the Benghazi investigation to fire up their base and raise money.

Republican Hypocrisy on Emails. They want to hold former Secretary Clinton to a different standard than they'd hold themselves.

Summary: Major presidential campaign coverage revolved around the candidates energy plans as both sides continue to wage attacks on their counter's positions. McCain spoke at nuclear power plants at Sturgis, SD last night and in Michigan today where he hit Obama on his lack of support for nuclear power and offshore drilling. McCain is now proposing building 45 new plants by 2030. In a testament to the McCain campaign's research department and advance team, the Senator spoke about the importance of nuclear energy at a plant famed for its near meltdown in the 60s. Tire gauge controversy also dominated discussion as well as new ads by McCain claiming to be "the original Maverick" and from Paris Hilton, who comically responded to McCain's use of her image in a previous ad. Non-campaign headlines included tornado's ravaging Chicago, Hurricane Edouard ended up being weaker than expected, the price of oil drops $2.24, stocks went up, aftershocks in China, the Feds caught computer identity thieves accused of stealing 40 million American internet users identities, and hundreds of undiscovered gorillas were found in the Congo.

Highlight #1
McCain Pushes Nuclear Power, Offshore Drilling, and Calls For Congress To Return to Session (CNN 08/05/08 5:05pm)
WOLF BLITZER: Raw and unfiltered, John McCain speaking in Michigan today after touring a nuclear plant in Newport. He talked about why nuclear power should play a big part in the solution to America's energy problems.

JOHN MCCAIN: Solving our national energy crisis requires, as I mentioned in all of the above approach, and that will require aggressive development of alternative energies like wind, solar, tide, and bio-fuels. It also requires expanding additional sources of energy such as offshore drilling. And I notice that, it's confusing now information from Senator Obama as to whether he actually supports offshore drilling or not. The fact is, we have to drill here and we have to drill now and we have to drill immediately. And it has to be done as quickly as possible and I believe that it's vital that we move forward with that regardless of what we do on other energy issues. Senator Obama has said that expanding our nuclear power plants quote, "doesn't make sense for America." He also says no to nuclear storage and no to reprocessing. I could not disagree more. My experience with nuclear power goes back many years to being stationed on board the USS Enterprise, the first nuclear powered aircraft. Aircraft carrier. I knew it was safe then, and I know it's safe now. And I propose a plan to build 45 new nuclear plants before the year 2030 and that would provide 700,000 jobs for American workers. And that means new jobs, and if we really want to enable technologies of tomorrow like plug-in electric cars, we need electricity to plug into. Now, we all know that nuclear power isn't enough and drilling isn't enough. And we need to do all this and more. And it's time that the Congress came back to Washington and went about the people's business. They just went on a five-week vacation without even in the slightest way, addressing this nation's energy needs. People are paying $4.00/gallon for gas are sick and tired of a Congress that won't act in their behalf. So I'm urging Senator Obama to urge the democratic leaders of Congress to call Congress back into session. Come back from their vacation and act on our energy challenges. When I'm President of the United States I'll call them back into session and I'll keep calling them back until they act on behalf of the interests of the American people and this compelling national security issue. And it's time we got serious about energy independence. Our nation is sending 700 billion dollars a year to countries that don't like us very much and some of that money ends up in the hands of terrorist organizations. We're going to achieve energy independence and we're going to get it done, and we're going to use every available resource at our disposal. That means the Lexington Project, which I have been talking about now for a long, long period of time. I hope that the Congress of the United States will come back into session address offshore drilling, which is absolutely vital, address nuclear power, and all of the other approaches that are very necessary to achieve energy independence.

McCain's Made a Poor Choice With "China Syndrome" Plant (MSNBC 08/05/08 6:06pm)

RACHAEL MADDOW: My headline tonight is Nuclear Misfire in Michigan . . . the McCain campaign's patented message scrambling technique is unfortunately back at work in this nuclear reactor photo op today. Remember that movie China Syndrome, about a catastrophic nuclear reactor meltdown? The phrase "China syndrome" was coined when the Enrico Fermi nuclear site that John McCain went to for his photo op today partially melted down in 1966. That nuclear accident also inspired a non-fiction thriller called "We Almost Lost Detroit." Not exactly what you want to make Americans think of when they think of your energy plan. It wasn't too long ago that McCain was planning on running as the eco-Republican green candidate who was explicitly not a proponent of nukes. Now he's running as the drill everywhere, build nuclear reactors everywhere candidate and the whole "We Almost Lost Detroit" reminder too was probably a bad political move for McCain.

DAVID GREGORY: But you've got a situation, Rachael, where both candidates now want to be on the record with almost everything. They want to be as comprehensive as possible when it comes to an energy plan because they're looking at the polls like everybody else.

MADDOW: Sure, and they now that every single time any American goes to the gas station, they're thinking about what can be done at a federal level to bring gas prices down. McCain . . . has come a long way in terms of the things that he's for and against on energy policy. I just think that his stagecraft needs a little work before he tours the China syndrome plant.

McCain Jumps From Figurative to Literal Meltdown (MSNBC 08/05/08 8:40pm)

KEITH OLBERMANN: Nothing like having one word sum up an entire day on the campaign trail. For John McCain the word was meltdown. Yes, the vernacular kind but the literal kind too . . . John McCain goes nuclear. At the famed biker festival in Sturgis, South Dakota, Sen. McCain launched an attack about energy independence, at least originally and then kind of got lost in some of the more complicated sentences.

JOHN MCCAIN: Is there anybody is that's tired of paying four dollars a du—a bu—bucks, four dollars a gallon for gasoline? Is there anybody that's sick and tired of it? Is there anybody that wants to become energy independent? Well I'm telling you right now, we're sending $700 billion over year and your congress just went on vacation for five weeks. Tell 'em to come back and get to work. Tell 'em to get to work! [cheering] When I'm President of the United States, I'm not going to let them go on vacation. They're going to become energy independent and we're not going to pay $4 a gallon for gas because we're going to drill offshore and we're going to drill now. And we're going to drill here and we're going to drill now. [bikes revving] My opponent doesn't want to drill, he doesn't want nuclear power. He wants you to inflate your tires. [booing] My friends, we need a commander in chief, we need a commander in chief who'll end the war in Iraq but will win it the right way and that's by winning it.

OLBERMANN: You let me know when you come up with that wrong way of winning a war by winning it. And while we explained to the senator last night how the Bush administration and NASCAR both insist that tire inflation really does save huge quantities of gas, Sen. Obama responded to McCain on his own today.

BARACK OBAMA: It's like these guys take pride in being ignorant. [laughter] You know? I mean, they think it's funny that they're making fun of something that's actually true. They need to do their homework . . .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

OLBERMANN: McCain meanwhile highlighted part of his energy plan, subsidies for more nuclear plants, touring a nuclear plant today, the first presidential candidate in recent memory to do so. Most apparently considering them politically radioactive. McCain's showpiece for safe nuclear energy? The Enrico Fermi 2 plant, half an hour from Detroit, half an hour from Ann Arbor, half an hour from Toledo, where a nuclear regulatory commission alert occurred after a leak forced a plant shutdown and cancellation of nearby afterschool activities. This following 2001's quote, "catastrophic bearing failure" of the emergency diesel generator there and the 1999 security violation at Fermi where someone got a loaded handgun inside. So why not tour Enrico Fermi Plant 1? Well, they shut that down in 1972 and enough liquid sodium still remains that just this May, it started a fire there which the NRC had to check for radioactivity. That and of course, Enrico Fermi 1 is best known for its actual, partial meltdown from 1966, chronicled in a best-seller called, "We Almost Lost Detroit." . . .

McCain's Nuclear Power Ambitions and His Attacks on Obama on ABC Nightly News (ABC 08/05/08 6:10pm)
CHARLES GIBSON: For the second day in a row the presidential candidates were talking about energy while campaigning in battleground states. […] Meanwhile, John McCain was in Michigan calling for construction of 45 new nuclear power plants by the year 2030. […]

RON CLAIBORNE: John McCain toured the 20 year old Fermi Nuclear facility near Detroit today, a campaign swing meant to highlight his call to building dozens of new atomic power plants in the U.S. […] McCain believes nuclear power is a viable way to produce electricity and decrease America's reliance on foreign oil. Some energy experts agree.

CHRIS LARSEN: The 40 or so power plants is consistent with some of our analysis in what would be required in the next 20 to 30 years in order to provide electricity at a reasonable cost.

CLAIBORNE: McCain also attacked Barack Obama today for, as McCain said, opposing expanding the use of nuclear power. […] Actually, Obama does not oppose more nuclear power plants, he favors going forward only if it can be done safely. McCain says it is safe now. […] The McCain campaign believes it is scoring points by hitting Obama hard on the energy issue, trying to brand him as opposed to nuclear power and offshore oil drilling, and ridiculing Obama for saying that inflating your tires will improve gas mileage. […] McCain and Obama believe energy has become a cutting issue. And both sides will continue pounding away at each other.

Romney Discusses Energy and Nuclear Power Solutions, Name Calling, and Dick Cheney (CNN 08/05/08 5:34pm)
WOLF BLITZER: […] In the past couple of days Senator Obama has been making this very serious charge against Senator McCain. […] Can you site one legislative accomplishment that Senator McCain produced during those 26 years in Washington in order to achieve energy independence?

MITT ROMNEY: Well I'm not a historian that goes through all of the pieces of legislation John McCain has worked on, but lets talk about one piece of legislation that's pretty relevant and that's the Bush energy plan which Barack Obama voted in favor of and John McCain looked at it and said it's so larded up with tax breaks and special incentives to oil companies and gas companies. John McCain voted no on that piece of legislation. They have very different perspectives. John McCain has laid out his plan to get energy independence and it includes nuclear power and it includes drilling offshore. Both of those things are opposed by Barack Obama and there's no way America can become energy independent and energy prices can come down without nuclear power and more drilling as well as all the alternative sources that both men agree on.

BLITZER: He also proposes, Senator McCain, a cut in the overall corporate tax structure in the United States and that would, in effect, represent a billion dollar a year bonanza, if not more, for EXXON Mobil and some of the other big oil companies. Should there be an exemption for the big oil companies who are producing record profits every quarter so they don't benefit from yet more tax breaks?

ROMNEY: You know, um, there's a real question that we have in this country as to whether we're going to believe in free market systems, and the way the markets work, free enterprise. Or whether, instead, we want to have government run economies and we can pick winners and losers and say that certain companies are making too much money. And then by the way, if companies don't do well, should government pay them money so they do better? This is where it all leads. You know, I don't like the fact that big oil is making the kind of money they're making, I don't think a lot of people are excited about it. At the same time, I'm not sure you want to jump in there and change the rules after many many investors, retirees, pension funds, and so forth have invested in companies like EXXON Mobil. Do you say, hey guess what guys, we're taking away those dividends that you invested for? So, in my view, you put down the law, you follow the rule of law, and you also lower the tax rates on small corporations, on all corporations to make America more competitive. We have tax rates, corporate tax rates, well higher than Europe, almost as high as Japan's which is the highest in the world. It's killing jobs here, John McCain's right.

BLITZER: Senator McCain in that ad that caused a lot of controversy the other day, he compared Senator Obama to Britney Spears and Paris Hilton. Just yesterday, you said Senator Obama was like quote " an internet date". Here's the question, is it appropriate to use these kind of comparisons against the democratic presidential nominee, in effect, is it appropriate to be name calling the democratic presidential candidate?

ROMNEY: Well, the name calling is on both sides of course, politics is a, well let's say it's not tiddlewinks by any means. And in many cases, you want to describe something in a way people remember. I thought that John McCain's ad was humorous and right on target. And in fact, we've watched Barack Obama give some wonderful speeches talking about hope and audacity, but what he hasn't done is talk about what he would do to solve the problems of America and now that Americans are actually listening to him talk about energy and finding that he opposes offshore drilling, and he opposes nuclear power, and he says that we can end our problems with energy with inflating our tires, more appropriately, and tuning up our engines, people say wow, this guy's not ready for primetime.

BLITZER: Do you regret calling him, saying he's like an internet date?

ROMNEY: No, it's like an internet date in that it sounded very good initially, when people look at him and hear him speak they say, wow this guy's great. But then you get to know him a little better and you say you know, what you really see behind the surface is not exactly what people had hoped for.

BLITZER: The Democratic National Committee, they've got a website basically saying that all of the Republican vice-presidential potential candidates out there represent the next Dick Cheney. […] You're on that short list, by all accounts, to be the vice-presidential running mate for Senator McCain. What do you think about Dick Cheney?

ROMNEY: You know, Dick Cheney is a fine person who has served this country with distinction. I don't agree with him on every issue, I don't agree with most republicans on every single issue. My guess is a lot of people who are being considered by John McCain as V.P. material are people who are very independent. Probably of John McCain, but also of Dick Cheney or George Bush. Just because we're republican doesn't mean we see all issues the same way and suggesting that we're all like Dick Cheney or we're all like George Bush is a nice effort on their part, but I frankly don't think it'll fly.

BLITZER: He's been Vice-President now for almost 8 years, earlier he was the Defense Secretary, he served in Congress, served as a White House Chief of Staff under then President Gerald Ford. Should he be invited to speak at this Republican Convention in St. Paul, because we're getting word he's not going to be there.

ROMNEY: Yeah, I have no idea who's going to be speaking at the convention.

BLITZER: But should he be? Should he speaking, should he be invited, given his public service over the years?

ROMNEY: I don't know, I don't know if he particularly cares, and I don't know if it makes a big difference. Frankly, what really makes a difference in a presidential election is who the presidential nominee is not who the vice president or who the vice presidential nominee is. A lot of folks are putting a lot of attention on these short lists, and who's on it and who's not, but you know what? It's going to come down to John McCain and Barack Obama. We're going to listen to their positions on issues, we're going to see them in debates, and on the basis of those two men, head to head, America's going to choose the next president, and they're going to want someone who can lead and has the experience of leading in difficult times. John McCain has been a leader all his life, Barack Obama hasn't had that experience yet. I'd like him to get it before we consider him for higher office.

BLITZER: Wouldn't it be insulting? Wouldn't it be a slap in the face of Dick Cheney if he weren't allowed to speak at the convention?

ROMNEY: Well, if Dick Cheney didn't want to speak at the convention it certainly wouldn't be a slap, and I don't know that anyone is suggesting that he will or won't speak. I just don't think it makes a big difference one way or another.

Romney Wrong on McCain's CAFE Standards Record (MSNBC 08/05/08
BARNICLE: . . . one of the great discussions in this country . . . has to do with energy . . . yesterday . . . Barack Obama gave a speech on . . . his energy proposals. What are yours? Not as a candidate . . . as a guy who knows a lot about energy . . . about putting together business plans. . .

ROMNEY: . . . you're going to have to pursue every possible source of new energy that America can find and at the same time . . . of energy efficiency we can achieve . . . more nuclear power. . . more drilling . . . more natural gas . . .liquefied coal . . . And . . . wind power, solar power. . . pursue them to the max and invest in new technologies, create incentives for enterprises to develop these new technologies. . . that happens to be John McCain's proposal, he wants to become energy independent . . . to pursue all of those avenues. Barack Obama says, no to nuclear power . . . offshore drilling and those two are essential if we're going to become seriously independent of our dependence on foreign oil.

BARNICLE: . . . in some . . . Americans' minds that if we engage in offshore oil drilling that the price of gas will come down within 2 or 3 weeks . . .So what'd you do about getting the price of gas in a manageable range in a relatively short period of time?

ROMNEY: . . . announcing . . . offshore drilling and going after some of the reserves that are available would have an immediate effect on price because the expectations of those that trade in oil futures would be that more supply is going to come on the market down the road . . . most of the impact is going to be longer term . . . and substantial. And what you have to do to affect global and US oil prices substantially is to have the largest consuming nation, that's us, lay out a course that says we're going to do what's necessary to get off of foreign oil. Just doing that . . . would have the effect of lowering gasoline prices almost immediately.

BARNICLE: . . . it's rare to see the word conservation right up top in John McCain's plan . . . yet . . . you're about to go off to China for the Olympics . . . a nation that's becoming increasingly greedy for energy sources along with nations like India. What can we do as Americans to conserve energy without risking our lifestyle? Or are we just too spoiled to conserve?

ROMNEY: Now actually, I think that you're going to see in this country . . . a far greater effort to become energy efficient than we've ever seen before and that's going to be in our automobiles. . . . John McCain has in fact been a supporter of the CAFE fuel standard tightening and that has had . . . or can have a major impact on our use of gasoline and oil products. . . it's going to have to be in our homes and energy usage in our homes. From the type of furnaces we use to heat our homes . . . air conditioning and our insulation systems. Probably the least expensive and most immediate impact we can have on energy prices . . . is by taking advantage of new energy efficiencies. That's something that I think John McCain will pursue with the same kind of aggressiveness he will pursue every source of additional energy. And that combination is what gets us to a point where we can say, "Thanks very much but we don't need your oil" to the Middle East.

BARNICLE: . . . a lot of Americans are fearful for the future and . . . are hurting economically, gas prices in particular . . . in 1980 Ronald Reagan ran against Jimmy Carter and phrased the question that Americans responded to . . . "Are you better off today than you were four years ago?". . . Do you think we're worse off today than we were four years ago?

ROMNEY: … with regards to the threat of . . . jihad I think we're in a better position in Iraq thanks to the virtue of the surge which John McCain pushed for a long time . . . with regards to the economy, the credit crisis, the mortgage crisis . . . the higher prices of gasoline have made the American family less well off . . . that's why you have John McCain standing up and saying, look, I'm an independent minded guy, I'm a maverick, I've fought for what I believe in from the very beginning . . . job number one in that regard is to get us off our dependence on foreign oil . . . he's not taking anything off the table . . . it's a very stark contrast with Barack Obama . . .

BARNICLE: Nothing off the table including raising taxes?

ROMNEY: Well, raising taxes doesn't … provide more sources of energy . . . that's one place where John McCain is saying no, I'm not going to raise taxes . . . he's also, look, to try and help families during the summer time saying we should have taken off the federal gas tax during the summer . . .

Donatelli Outlines McCain's Energy Plan, Attacks Obama's (MSNBC 08/05/08 4:30pm)
DAVID SHUSTER: The McCain campaign has repeatedly ridiculed Barack Obama's calls for conservation going so far as to hand out tire gauges to mock Obama. It was noted that Americans can save gas by keeping their tires properly inflated. Frank Donatelli's chairman of the RNC and spokesman for the McCain campaign. Frank, the Bush Administration's own highway department said that if more American's would properly inflate our tires and tune our engines we'd save about 800,000 barrels a day. Isn't that more than we'd get from John McCain's new offshore drilling plan?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

FRANK DONATELLI: Absolutely not. Look, no one is saying, David, that conservation isn't a good idea. But we need a plan that's balanced; we need a plan that addresses the long term and the short term solutions. Senator Obama's plan does not give us an additional drop of domestic oil, coal or nuclear, period.

SHUSTER: But you would acknowledge that John McCain's plan doesn't produce any new oil for at least seven years.

DONATELLI: I would not acknowledge that at all. Uh, experts tell us that in the Gulf of Mexico, for example, where there's already infrastructure you could additional oil online pretty quickly. In addition to that SHUSTER: Right, you can get it online but the refining capacity isn't there, right?

DONATELLI: Well, I mean you solve one problem at a time. We're also in favor of additional, well you have to do more in terms of our refining capacity also, but look, in the long term we have to make a commitment to do something about domestic energy supplies. Once we do that, the psychology of the markets will change. Even if it takes several years as far as drilling off the east and west coast, we have to begin now if we're going to fill the middle before we get into the long-term, where maybe alternative energy fuels might make a difference. But McCain has a plan.

SHUSTER: I want to get into the new ad that the McCain campaign is running. Here's part of it.

SHUSTER: Hey Frank, how's John McCain going to battle big oil?

DONATELLI: He will vote in the best interests to the United States on every piece of legislation. David, he has always done that.

SHUSTER: How's he going to battle big oil specifically?

DONATELLI: He will not give them specific subsidies like Senator Obama voted for in the 2005 bill. All he's going to do is he's going to strike

SHUSTER: I mean, he's giving them corporate tax breaks. Corporate tax breaks worth 3.8 billion dollars. Now granted, John McCain believes we should give every corporation tax breaks, so it is misleading to suggest, as Obama does, that somehow John McCain is singling out Exxon Mobile for tax breaks, but the fact of the matter is, don't you agree, that his corporate tax plan would lower the tax rate that a company like Exxon mobile's going to pay by nearly 3.8 billion dollars for big oil.

DONATELLI: David, as you pointed out, lower taxes for corporations are lower taxes for all corporations, not just oil, and we do that because at some point taxes are too high, it discourages work and incentive and it lowers our economic growth. We have the highest corporate tax rate in the world. If Senator McCain advocates lowering the corporate tax rate, it's because he believes that our economy needs to be kicked in gear. We need to create jobs and the private sector does that, the government does not do that.

SHUSTER: Frank, one more quick question. At the start of the ad, we heard the ad say that we are worse off than we were four years ago. But during this campaign, John McCain said that we've made great progress economically. So what is it, great progress, or worse off?

DONATELLI: Like most economic statistics, it's a mixed bag. Clearly in terms of the short term, in terms of inflation and in terms of unemployment, we are not in a good situation. On the other hand, there are statistics showing that we have made progress in certain areas. So it's a mixed bag. But f or right now, the economy is soft, we're teetering on the brink of a potential downturn. The last thing, David, that we need to do now is do what Senator Obama says, and raise virtually every tax known to man. What we need to do is keep taxes low, and that will eventually strengthen our economy.

SHUSTER: Frank Donatelli's the spokesman for the McCain campaign, one of the pros who can hit 'em back just as hard as we throw them at him.

The Original Maverick? New McCain Ad Tries to Distance Himself From President Bush (FNC 08/05/08 7:34pm)
SHEPARD SMITH: McCain's out with a brand new ad today calling himself the original Maverick. […] Is that a response to Obama's claim that McCain's running for president for Bush's third term.

CARL CAMERON: Yes and no. McCain's boasted about his independence for years. But buying airtime is a very big step. And it's true that Obama's scuffed up McCain's image. So, McCain's sort of trying to set the record straight. His argument is that Obama promises change but has little record or history of it because he's fairly new to politics. Where as McCain's managed for years to be pushing reforms through Congress that an awful lot of people never thought would ever get through.

SMITH: McCain's ad also says we're worse off than we were four years ago, which economically speaking is hard to argue with, but a serious shot at President Bush.

CAMERON: It is, McCain makes no bones about differing with the President but aides say that when the campaigns over it'll be hard to recognize that McCain and Bush were ever in the same party. They also say that what McCain really thinks is that we are better off than we were 8 years ago when Bush took over for President Clinton, but in the last four years or so, the House Republicans and the President sort of lost control of spending. And he's never been afraid of dissing republicans when it serves his political lens. […] It is true that McCain has cast an awful lot of votes in Congress in line with his party and his President, but it's also true that McCain has stuck his finger in the eye of the G.O.P. far more than anybody. And certainly far more than Obama has with democrats. McCain's known for aggravating his party and Obama's known for a fairly reliable, albeit newcomer democrat.

Carney: "'Broken' Recalls McCain's Record As a So-Called Maverick in Washington (MSNBC 08/05/08 6:03pm)
JAY CARNEY: . . . McCain remembers who he was, his new ad is called "Broken," and what it breaks is a streak of non-stop attacks from the McCain campaign . . . the new ad instead recalls McCain's record as a so-called maverick in Washington . . .

CARNEY: . . .the attacks will not stop on Obama. They succeeded, I think, in reinvigorating the McCain campaign and exciting Republicans and making them believe perhaps they won't lose this race after all but the McCain campaign will spend . . . a great deal of money reminding voters of what they thought they liked about McCain before this campaign.

DAVID GREGORY: It is striking though, it says that you are worse off than four years ago, not eight years ago, when he did campaign for Bush's reelection.

CARNEY: Well, it is interesting and it's a hard situation because, as we know, President Bush will speak at the Republican Convention. President Bush's legacy hangs over the party and this Republican nominee and is a distraction and a problem for John McCain in his race for the White House.

The Tire Gauge The Political Prop of the Week (CNN 08/05/08 6:57pm)
JEANE MOOS: Could this be the hiss of the air going out of a political stunt? The tire pressure gauge has become the political prop of the week, as the McCain campaign uses it to try to deflate Senator Obama. […] This is what Senator Obama did say as he kicked off things individuals could do save energy.

BARACK OBAMA: Making sure your tires are properly inflated.

MOSE: Those seven words became what the McCain campaign dubbed "Obama's energy plan". Emblazoned on tire pressure gauges they handed out on the press plane. McCain folks even handed out tire gauges to people lining up for an Obama rally. They're being sold on Ebay for 10 bucks. And over and over Senator McCain used tire inflation to tred on Obama. […] Tire pressure, tire pressure, all this talk about tire pressure is raising my blood pressure. […] Boo, hiss is what columnist Joe Klein is saying.

JOE KLEIN: I think the McCain campaign has this weird idea that you can win a presidential election through mockery.

MOOS: But the Automobile Association of America isn't mocking tire inflation. On a vehicle like this, just one tire, […] could result in this. [Losing about 8 percent of your fuel economy] After several days of republican spin on the tire issue Obama got tired of it. […] His actual energy plan fills page after page on his website. AAA expert found out it's not just the gauge that's feeling the pressure.

Holtz-Eakin Defends Tire Gauges and McCain's Energy Policy (MSNBC 08/05/08 2:06pm)
TAMRON HALL: . . . the offshore oil drilling, there's of course been a compromise according to Sen. Obama, as he has described it, we saw John McCain do the same thing but much earlier . . . did Sen. Obama . . . . wait too long to come up with the idea on offshore oil drilling?

AUSTAN GOLDBEE: There's a political distinction there on how to make a compromise to get a real energy bill and then there's a what will put money in people's pockets right now and Obama's been way ahead of the curve on that. The offshore oil drilling is not going to affect supply for 5 to 7 years . . .

JOHN HARWOOD: . . . John McCain's out with a new ad today out in battleground states . . . John McCain returns to that maverick image he had . . .

HARWOOD: So, Austen, what'd you see,? Are you convinced? . . .

GOLDBEE: I didn't see big oil mentioned. I know he got $2 million dollars or so from big oil when he said he was going to be in favor of opening up . . . to offshore oil drilling . . . I'm a little puzzled why, when they got 40 million acres offshore with about 5 times the oil in it, where they're allowed to drill now and they have chosen not to, why we would be giving them another gift of offshore drilling acres where there's a lot less oil.

HARWOOD: So how come Doug?

DOUGLAS HOLTZ-EAKIN: Well, I mean, Sen. McCain has a comprehensive energy policy designed to solve real problems. A real problem we have is the need for alternatives to imported oil. He's proposed expanding domestic production of oil, Sen. Obama's opposed. He's proposed more natural gas to help our manufacturing and home heating costs, Sen. Obama's opposed. We're going to use our coal, it's our most abundant energy resource, Sen. Obama said no. He's today talking about nuclear power; 45 new plants, clean, zero emissions, you could drive on it at three cents a mile. Sen. Obama's opposed. So, you know, I'm confused by why Sen. Obama describes what went on in Washington as progress. Congress failed completely. They melted down. They left. Nothing got done. If that's his notion of progress we have a problem . . .

HALL: . . . I'm going to ask about what a lot of folks are talking about—this gas gauge that the McCain campaign has been passing around, showing that Sen. Obama has the, quote/unquote, "simple idea," and even mocking him in this ad. Some people are saying progress is not pointing these little innuendos and this little back and forth, it is really hammering to the folks at home the policy, the energy policy, both long term and what can happen. Why, why use the gas gauge strategy? Especially when even the US Highway Association says that it is a good idea to make sure your tires're inflated, it will save you some money.

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Sen. Obama's words, his speech yesterday revealed that he either doesn't understand the magnitude of this problem or he's just not being straight with the American people. He proposed getting rid of ¼ of oil imports. And the way he proposed doing it, some hybrids, a bio-fuels objective, some more CAFÉ standards would solve about a third of that problem. It's like throwing a gas gauge at it. It's time for real solutions. It's time for people who will, instead of voting for the 2005 energy act which had all the handouts for big oil, will stand up to their party, reach across the aisle, solve problems for real people. That's what John McCain's talking about. This isn't about where your poll numbers are. This is about having alternatives to imported oil, it's a national security threat, it's about having cleaner electricity because we need to solve the global warming problem and it's about having a comprehensive ability to divorce ourselves from the threat of international oil markets. The American people have been held hostage far too long.

HARWOOD: Now Doug, Barack Obama was in Ohio today . . . he attacked John McCain pretty directly by linking him to President Bush. Let's take a listen to this . . .

BARACK OBAMA: Under Sen. McCain's plan . . . we stay in the same cycle of dependence on oil that got us into this problem in the first place. The oil companies have placed their bets on John McCain . . .

HARWOOD: So Doug, in your ad, John McCain says that he would take on big oil, Barack Obama says he's in the pocket of big oil. Talk about that.

HOLTZ-EAKIN: John McCain said no to the 2005 Energy Act, which gave the big handouts to big oil. He's proposed repealing all special tax treatment for oil companies. What Sen. Obama is missing—

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HARWOOD: He's giving them what they want on drilling right?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: He's missing the facts on the ground, which are that all the experts say that a comprehensive approach, everything has to be in the mix, oil, natural gas, coal, nuclear power, renewables, the biomasses, the biofuels, that's the center's Lexington project. And it is absolutely important that Sen. Obama understand that American jobs leave this country, jobs that have retirement benefits, health benefits, because we have the second highest corporate tax rate and if wants to attack John McCain for taking care of the American worker, I believe he's on the wrong side of that issue as well.

Hi everyone – we wanted to give you some updates on recent events, Foundation work, and announcements in the news this week and last.

Women's Empowerment in Haiti
Refinery29 joined the Clinton Foundation on our recent trip to Haiti, where they got a firsthand look at our work there and what we're doing to empower girls and women. We hope you'll watch the video that accompanies the piece as well.

> "I think there is such a case for optimism about Haiti," Chelsea says. "And also really about what women can do when we're truly unfettered." These female entrepreneurs strive for success not because it will bring them wealth or fame, but because with steady employment, they're able to economically support not just their families but also other women as well.

In New Orleans, Shifting the Focus from "Recovery to Innovation"
Yesterday, New Orleans Mayor Mitch Landrieu wrote an op-ed published by Quartz commemorating the 10th anniversary of Hurricane Katrina. The piece highlights the work of President Clinton and CGI members to build back New Orleans following the storm. Retweet Mayor Landrieu's op-ed here.

> I had the opportunity to meet with [President Clinton] when he came down to New Orleans on behalf of the Bush-Clinton Katrina Fund following the hurricane and subsequent levee failures. He had recognized this moment as a global challenge rather than just a local disaster. It was then that we heard about his plans for the Clinton Global Initiative–a cross-sector platform that eventually transformed philanthropy and informed our efforts to put New Orleans back together.

Correcting Inaccuracies about the Foundation

Knowing the facts is important. In an article about Sen. Rand Paul's trip to Haiti, the AP portrayed Paul's claim that "almost none" of Foundation funding went to charity as an open question instead of debunked falsehood .

> The Associated Press presented Sen. Rand Paul's false attack that "almost none" of the Clinton Foundation's spending goes to charity as an unresolved, open question. But experts say the Clinton Foundation's charitable spending is "very good" by industry standards, and attacks like Paul's are "simply wrong" and amount "to a misunderstanding of how public charities work."

Subject:	What's the difference between a German and a shopping cart? A shopping cart has got a mind of its own

“Men never do evil so fully and cheerfully as when they do it out of conscience.” (Blaise Pascal, 1623-1662)

That Frau Schmerkel – who has ordered the blitz banlieue-ization of Dunkeldeutschland & its surrounding vassal states, even though she herself has reached the conclusion that masses of Muslims have brought nothing but massive misery to the Heimat – has gone completely bonkers was already evident from her Monty Pythonesque energy policy. Have a listen to a comedy clip with English-language subtitles https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=-e2U2cYcPro .

Germany’s energy policy manages to harm the environment and cripple the German economy at the same time…….. That’s yet another example of German gawd-awful Gutmenscherei, more aptly described as Vollidioterei – which is set to do more ever-lasting damage to the whole of Europe than all other previous German extremist ideologies combined. Normally, I would look for corroborating evidence in the local media, but the only thing you can learn from the German press is that there are 50 ways to tell a ludicrous lie about Mama Merkel & her Multikulti Morass.

Among the multitudes of MSM falsehoods rammed down the throats of German brainwasheables, the German media are arguing that the many millions of new arrivals will somehow replenish Germany’s graying and shrinking labor force. Never mind that all available figures show that the vast majority of working-age Muslims in Euroweenieland are not only jobless, but also structurally unemployable (completely lacking in all marketable skills). The frightening future of German schmeducation can be best seen in a clip giving an impression of your average Mickey Mouse vocational school, which aims to turn Muslim kids into semi-employables at the lowest possible level and fails miserably across the board https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=fzMzT6MEzu0 . Go to 30 seconds. To give you an idea, a mind-mashing 63 percent of preschool immigrant children (often 4th generation!) in Berlin’s Kreuzberg district speak little or no German and are theoretically inadmissible to an elementary school, disclosed Professor of Pedagogy Ali Ucar in Time magazine.

What makes for successful immigration?

It's no brain surgery, but the media have long failed to provide a clear credible answer. They are unable to come up with an answer or don't like the answer that's staring them in the face. The main reason behind successful immigration should be painfully obvious to even the most dimwitted of observers: Some groups of people are almost always highly successful given only half a chance (Jews*, Hindus/Sikhs and Chinese people, for example), while others (Muslims, blacks and Roma, for instance) fare badly almost irrespective of circumstances. The biggest group of humanity can be found somewhere between those two extremes – the perennial overachievers and the professional never-do-wells.

 On average, Jewish households in Britain are twice as wealthy as the rest of the country. So says Trevor Phillips, a former Chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality. Britain's Hindus/Sikhs are runners-up.*

* 75 percent of welfare-pampered Dutch gypsies have an official criminal record, as the Mayor of Amsterdam disclosed. So it does not take a genius to figure out that crime levels are even more mind-blowing among the 12 million overwhelmingly dirt-poor Roma from and in Eastern Europe. "95 percent" sounds like a fine ballpark extrapolation. But on all fronts, gypsies are below the bottom of the barrel. In the Czech Republic, for example, an eye-bulging 35 percent of all children in special-needs schools are Roma kids, who are overrepresented by a factor of 10……. For decades, the Communists in Eastern Europe forced integration on Roma people – complete with education and guaranteed make-work jobs. It was one big fiasco. Indeed, the Communists invented the crime of "parasitism" specifically for all those Roma who refused to work under any circumstances…….*

In the Banlieuerepublik Deutschland, a Jew runs into the US Embassy, grabs the Ambassador by the lapels and yells, "You've got to help me escape!" "Calm down," replies the diplomat. "Here's a map of Europe. Just pick any European country without a sizeable Muslim population, and I'll make sure you can go there." The Jew turns the map around and back, studying it from close by and from afar, finally asking the Ambassador, "Would you have another map for me?"

This footage with English subtitles of two anti-Semitic incidents http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=j9nbKp1KJ1Y&feature=related was recorded in the Netherlands, but could just as easily have been filmed anywhere else in Banlieue-ized Western Europe. Euroweenieland is rapidly turning into a continent-sized no-go area for visibly Jewish Jews. Little wonder that former EU Commissioner Frits Bolkestein has warned them to get out now they still can. The vast majority of anti-Jewish incidents and attacks are attributable to Western Europe's Muslim population – despite all the maliciously obfuscating MSM efforts to somehow pin the blame on the Far Right. The same goes for gay-bashing http://www.torontosun.com/comment/columnists/ezra_levant/2010/10/08/15630946.html .

The same Germany that once destroyed Europe's Jewry (its best & brightest citizens by a yawning margin) is now bringing about the massive Muslimization of Europe (all Muslim communities in Europe are socioeconomic disaster zones, as I've shown with cartloads of statistics)

In contemplating the life and thought of German-speaking Jewry during the pre-Nazi era, you cannot help being struck by an unprecedented record of creative achievement by so small a group. For well over half a century, the confluence of these two intellectual traditions – the German and the Jewish – produced such an outpouring of literature, music, science and ideas that, hadn't it been for its infamous finale, historians would now be writing about a Austro-German Golden Age, comparable to the Italian Renaissance, the Dutch Golden Age and the 20th-century American Cultural Boom. It was a time of Mahler's Lied von der Erde, Freud's The Interpretation of Dreams, Kafka's The Trial and Einstein's Theory of Relativity. Similarly, of the 29 Germans who won a Nobel Prize in physics, chemistry or medicine until 1933, 10 were of Jewish descent, even though Germany was home to no more than HALF A MILLION Jews in 1933….. out of a total population of 67 million. Put differently, ridiculously über-achieving Jews formed about 0.75 percent of the German population.

In early-1930s Berlin, the 160,000-strong Jewish community accounted for 27% of doctors, 48% of lawyers and 56% of notaries. Moreover, in prewar Vienna, the 144,000 strong Jewish community produced over 50% of doctors and 70% of lawyers. But this blossoming of Jewish science and culture was cut short by the Nazi regime, which came to power in 1933. By 1939, some 380,000 Jews*, including Germany's crème de la crème, had managed to escape. It is was the biggest intellectual migration in history. Of the remaining German Jews,170,000 were murdered. Likewise, out of 180,000 Austrian Jews, 65,000 perished at the hands of the Nazis. The rest had managed to flee their home country. (*All these figures may vary a bit depending on the sources used and require checking.)

Irony of all ironies, the Jewish community in the Austro-Hungarian Empire and one of its successor states, Austria, accounted for almost all famous Austro-Hungarians and Austrians: Harry Houdini, Gustav Mahler, Johann Strauss the Elder, Johann Strauss the Younger, Arnold Schoenberg, Alban Berg, Erich von Stroheim, Arnold Schoenberg, Sigmund Freud, Ludwig Wittgenstein, Alfred Adler, Franz Kafka, Robert Capa, Bruno Kreisky, Arthur Schnitzler, Theodor Herzl, Ludwig Wittgenstein, Peter Drucker, Billy Wilder and Simon Wiesenthal. (IMO, Wiesenthal did go from hero to zero in no time at all after committing blatant Communist Holocaust Denial; more about that at a later date).

so much to ask from a child
after all I've done?

(From Haikus for Jews: For You, a Little Wisdom by David M. Bader)

Jews – who now make up 0.2% of the global population or about 13 million people (one megacity) – have produced:

54% of world chess champions
51% of Pulitzer Prize winners for nonfiction
37 percent of all the Academy Award-winning film directors
36% of the Nobel economics winners
31% of the Nobel medicine winners
27% of the Nobel physics winners
18% of the Nobel chemistry winners
76% of America's top-200 intellectuals (source: the 1998 book The Vanishing American Jew)
40% of US-won Nobel prizes
As the King of Siam said, etc., etc., etc.

By starkest possible contrast, out of more than 500 Nobel laureates in the sciences, only two have been Muslims, namely Ahmed Zewail in chemistry and Abdus Salam in physics. Muslims currently represent about 1.5 billion people or one fifth of the global population, aka Merkel's Milling Masses.

In an unguarded moment, Rob Reiner of All in the Family fame once blurted out what many Jews and Gentiles secretly believe, but rarely say aloud, "I think Jews are the smartest people in the world." He could have added, "By an eerily wide margin!" Jewish stupendous superiority in so many spheres of life is one of many PC taboos just begging to be busted.

One group of people has long outperformed all other Earthlings by such a bizarrely wide margin that it singlehandedly smashes this all-folks-are-equal myth into millions of smithereens. Jews – who account for just 0.2% of the global population or just 13.4 million http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jews – have won 36% of Nobel prizes in economics; 25% of Nobel prizes in medicine; 24% of Nobel prizes in physics; 18% of Nobel prizes in chemistry; as well as 11% of Nobel prizes in literature http://www.science.co.il. In fact, these brain-blowing figures may be *under*counts. David Brooks of the New York Times writes http://www.nytimes.com/2010/01/12/opinion/12brooks.html , "Jews are a famously accomplished group. They make up 0.2 percent of the world population, but 54 percent of the world chess champions, 27 percent of the Nobel physics laureates and 31 percent of the medicine laureates. Jews make up 2 percent of the U.S. population, but 21 percent of the Ivy League student bodies, 26 percent of the Kennedy Center honorees, 37 percent of the Academy Award-winning directors, 38 percent of those on a recent Business Week list of leading philanthropists, 51 percent of the Pulitzer Prize winners for nonfiction."

Add hard work to breathtaking Jewish intellectual prowess, and magnificent miracles start happening. Or to quote Goethe on the work ethic among the Jews he knew, "Energy is the basis of everything. Every Jew, no matter how insignificant, is engaged in some decisive and immediate pursuit of a goal."

The 1998 book The Vanishing American Jew by Prof. Alan Dershowitz claims that, while Jews constituted a measly 2% of the US population, 40% of American Nobel Prize winners in science and economics were Jewish. Indeed, at the time of its publication, Prof. Dershowitz went as far as stating that 50% America's 200 leading intellectuals were Jewish and that 76% percent had at least one Jewish parent. Anyone reading up on just about any sector of American society can only confirm his findings.

Here is a hastily slapped-together tip-of-the-iceberg list of world-famous American Jews, which needs to be thoroughly checked for accuracy. Frankly, I stopped adding names to the list when I saw that there are Wiki lists out there about the same subject long enough to reach the Moon or perhaps even Mars:

Nothing illustrates the impact of the Jewish brain drain from Europe to the U.S. more dramatically than nuclear research. In 1939, American scientists began setting up a project to exploit the newly discovered fission process for military purposes. At the urging of his fellow scientists, Albert Einstein approached President Roosevelt, explaining the unbelievable military potential of the atomic bomb, while also pointing out the dangers of nuclear research conducted in Nazi Germany. Einstein's warning resulted in the Manhattan Project and the development of the American atomic bomb. The project was run by Robert Oppenheimer, himself an American of German Jewish descent. Many of the scientists working on the Manhattan Project were Jewish Americans or Jewish refugees from Nazi-occupied Europe. Nobel laureate Niels Bohr, who was half Jewish and had escaped from his native Denmark, worked on the development of the bomb as well. He was assisted by his son Aage Bohr (a future Nobel Prize winner) and the Jewish Hungarian Edward Teller (who would later lead the development of the hydrogen bomb). They were joined by Felix Bloch, another future Jewish Nobel laureate. Los Alamos in New Mexico, where the research took place, was simply packed with current and future Nobel laureates. Nuclear weapons would have almost certainly been used against the Third Reich, if it hadn't already surrendered by the time the Americans produced their first nukes.

In 1977, Albert Speer commented, "History is fraught with irony. The opportunities offered by a German atomic bomb were destroyed by Hitler himself, who regarded Einstein's ideas and nuclear research in general as 'Jewish science.' This is why we didn't have a cyclotron or something similar. We simply failed to use the lead in atomic research achieved before the war...." Germany owed its leading position to the work done by many brilliant Jewish scientists who fled Nazi Germany in the mid-30s and often went on to develop the American atomic bomb. Ironically, many of the top atomic scientists in the Soviet Union were also of Jewish extraction. German anti-Semitism both seriously depleted the country's scientific potential and vastly increased that of the allies. The Americans, for example, warmly welcomed William F. Friedman, leader of the team that solved the Japanese PURPLE cipher machine, which provided great insight into German and Japanese policy. By contrast, the Germans never managed to break any of the major military codes used by the allies, and their intelligence-gathering effort was basically a failure.

Rand Paul: Deport terrorists to Afghanistan

Forget the Civil Rights Act. What about Rand Paul's views on foreign policy?

Just as his criticism of parts of the Civil Rights Act had been out there for weeks before exploding onto the national media scene, Paul has expressed foreign policy views that have yet to attract serious attention but also raise questions about his true core beliefs.

For instance: Paul has suggested deporting terrorists to Afghanistan and has said that it's not a threat if Iran has a nuke -- both views that smack of his father's staunch isolationism.

Paul's vanquished GOP primary opponent, Secretary of State Trey Grayson, tried to make issues of these views but they attracted virtually no national notice.

For instance, the Grayson campaign pointed out that Paul said this in May of 2009 in a discussion of Guantanamo:

"If you're not going to convict them and you can't convict them and you're unclear, drop them back off in Afghanistan; it'll take them a while to get back over here."

According to the Lexington Herald-Leader, Grayson made an issue of this comment, but Paul denied he favors closing Guantanamo, insisting Grayson took the comment out of context.

Grayson also pointed out that Paul also said in 2008 that the United States is "not threatened by Iran having one nuclear weapon."

During the GOP primary Paul also distanced himself from that comment, clarifying that "it's not desirable for Iran to have nuclear weapons."

Yesterday, Frank Rich noted that even on foreign policy he's a staunch isolationist: "when he says he is antigovernment, he means it."

Indeed, the above are two examples where Paul previously expressed views that he rushed to clarify once he became a major candidate for U.S. Senate. The point is that the national press has yet to explore Paul's foreign policy positions -- and who knows what bounty that will yield!

Politico: "Exclusive: GOP poll of women: Party 'stuck in past'"

By Jake Sherman and Anna Palmer

August 27, 2014, 5:47 p.m. EDT

A detailed report commissioned by two major Republican groups — including one backed by Karl Rove — paints a dismal picture for Republicans, concluding female voters view the party as "intolerant," "lacking in compassion" and "stuck in the past."

Women are "barely receptive" to Republicans' policies, and the party does "especially poorly" with women in the Northeast and Midwest, according to an internal Crossroads GPS and American Action Network report obtained by POLITICO. It was presented to a small number of senior aides this month on Capitol Hill, according to multiple sources involved.

Republicans swore they'd turn around the party's performance with women after Mitt Romney's loss in 2012. And while they are in good shape in 2014, poised to pick up seats in the House and possibly take the majority in the Senate, the new report shows that they have not improved their standing with women — which could exacerbate their problems if Hillary Clinton is the Democratic nominee in 2016.

The report — "Republicans and Women Voters: Huge Challenges, Real Opportunities" — was the product of eight focus groups across the country and a poll of 800 registered female voters this summer. The large-scale project was a major undertaking for the GOP groups.

"The gender gap is hardly a new phenomenon, but nevertheless it's important for conservatives to identify what policies best engage women, and our project found multiple opportunities," said Dan Conston, a spokesman for the American Action Network. "It's no surprise that conservatives have more work to do with women."

Republicans in D.C. say they recognize the problem. Republicans who have seen or been briefed on the polling were not surprised about the outcome. The poll was conducted by Public Opinion Strategies and Axis Research.

Paul Lindsey, the spokesman for Rove-backed Crossroads GPS, said, "There are a number of House policymakers and staff who have been willing to focus on issues important to women, and we think it's important that they are aware of the policy solutions that are available to help address these concerns."

The solutions offered include neutralizing Democratic attacks that the GOP doesn't support "fairness" for women; "deal honestly with any disagreement on abortion, then move to other issues"; and "pursue policy innovations that inspire women voters to give the GOP a 'fresh look.'"

The report is blunt about the party's problems. It says 49 percent of women view Republicans unfavorably, while just 39 percent view Democrats unfavorably.

It also found that Republicans "fail to speak to women in the different circumstances in which they live" — as breadwinners, for example. "This lack of understanding and acknowledgment closes many minds to Republican policy solutions," the report says. The groups urge Republicans to embrace policies that "are not easily framed as driven by a desire to aid employers or 'the rich.'"

Two policies former House Majority Leader Eric Cantor promoted as a way to make inroads with middle-class women and families — charter schools and flexible work schedules — were actually the least popular policies among female voters.

Republicans have long had a troubled relationship with female voters, but this report, which comes out just months before Election Day, is the most recent detailed illustration of the problem. Republicans have several initiatives to attract female candidates and voters. Rep. Cathy McMorris Rodgers of Washington, the No. 4 House Republican, for example, is spearheading her chamber's effort. The Republican National Committee is trying to engage women in 25 "targeted counties for the midterm election," a spokesman said.

One bright spot is among married women. Married women without a college degree view Republicans favorably, the polling shows. Married women prefer a Republican over a Democrat, 48 percent to 38 percent.

"Just like a gender gap exists, a marriage gap also exists," Conston said. "While young unmarried women have always skewed liberal, the polling found married women across the country are far more likely to be conservative and are receptive to center-right policies."

But the GOP appears to have a long way to go when it comes to capturing a significant slice of the female electorate.

Even on fiscal matters — traditionally the party's strongest issue set — Republicans hold only slight advantages that do not come close to outweighing their negative attributes. The GOP holds a 3 percent advantage over Democrats when female voters are asked who has "good ideas to grow the economy and create jobs," and the same advantage on who is "fiscally responsible and can be trusted with our tax dollars."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When female voters are asked who “wants to make health care more affordable,” Democrats have a 39 percent advantage, and a 40 percent advantage on who “looks out for the interests of women.” Democrats have a 39 percent advantage when it comes to who “is tolerant of other people’s lifestyles.”

Female voters who care about the top four issues — the economy, health care, education and jobs — vote overwhelmingly for Democrats. Most striking, Democrats hold a 35-point advantage with female voters who care about jobs and a 26 percent advantage when asked which party is willing to compromise. House Republicans say jobs and the economy are their top priorities.

Andrea Bozek, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, said the party’s candidates “across the country are speaking directly to female voters both on the campaign trail and in their television ads.”

But in Washington, Republican policies have failed to sway women — in fact, they appear to have turned women off. For example, the focus groups and polls found that women “believe that ‘enforcing equal pay for equal work’ is the policy that would ‘help women the most.’”

“Republicans who openly deny the legitimacy of the issue will be seen as out of touch with women’s life experiences,” the report warned, hinting at GOP opposition to pay-equity legislation. It’s the policy item independents and Democrats believe will help women the most.

The groups suggest a three-pronged approach to turning around their relationship with women. First, they suggest the GOP “neutralize the Democrats’” attack that Republicans don’t support fairness for women. They suggest Republican lawmakers criticize Democrats for “growing government programs that encourage dependency rather than opportunities to get ahead.” That message tested better than explaining that the GOP supports a number of policies that could help fairness for women.

Second, the groups suggest Republicans “deal honestly with any disagreement on abortion, then move to other issues.” And third, “pursue policy innovations that inspire women voters to give the GOP a ‘fresh look.’” The report suggests lawmakers and candidates inject “unexpected” GOP policy proposals into the debate as a way to sway female voters. Suggestions include ways to improve job-training programs, “strengthening enforcement against gender bias in the workplace” and “expanding home health care services by allowing more health care professionals to be paid by Medicare for home health services.”

Katie Packer Gage, a political strategist who focuses on improving GOP standing with female voters, said women think of “old, white, right, out of touch” men when they think of the Republican Party.

“I think a lot of folks are whistling past the graveyard on this … Certainly if Hillary is on the top of the ticket for Democrats, it is going to be a significant challenge for us,” she said in an interview. “Maybe we’ll see women on our side that will step up as well. … We have to quit sitting back and taking it on the chin. I think we have to play offense on this.”

People: “Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand: 'I Will Help Hillary Get Elected'”

By Tara Fowler and Sandra Sobieraj

August 27, 2014, 4:45 p.m. EDT

Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand isn't positive Hillary Clinton will run for president, but the woman who took Clinton's former New York Senate seat would like to think so.

"In my mind, she's definitely running," Gillibrand tells PEOPLE. "Anytime I've ever talked to her, I've offered every bit of help in the world and she's never said no."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For her part, Gillibrand, whose candid new book Off the Sidelines hits shelves Sept 9., doesn't have her eye on the presidency quite yet. She's perfectly content where she is at the moment.

"I have young kids," says the mom of two, when asked if she'd consider a bid for the White House. "I really like where I am."

"I don't know that I aspire to it," she adds. "It's a very different job. I feel like where I am, I can accomplish a lot."

It's her current job with the United States Senate that's provided the fodder for her insightful – and sometimes groan-worthy – memoir.

In Off the Sidelines, Gillibrand, 47, shares a sobering incident in the congressional gym, where an older, male colleague told her, "Good thing you're working out, because you wouldn't want to get porky!" On another occasion, she writes, after she dropped 50 lbs. one of her fellow Senate members approached her, squeezed her stomach, and said, "Don't lose too much weight now. I like my girls chubby!"

Gillibrand isn't especially offended by her coworkers' remarks. "It was all statements that were being made by men who were well into their 60s, 70s or 80s," she says. "They had no clue that those are inappropriate things to say to a pregnant woman or a woman who just had a baby or to women in general."

By Sen. Rand Paul

August 27, 2014, 6:35 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Our Middle Eastern policy is unhinged, flailing about to see who to act against next, with little regard to consequences.

As the murderous, terrorist Islamic State continues to threaten Iraq, the region and potentially the United States, it is vitally important that we examine how this problem arose. Any actions we take today must be informed by what we've already done in the past, and how effective our actions have been.

Shooting first and asking questions later has never been a good foreign policy. The past year has been a perfect example.

In September President Obama and many in Washington were eager for a U.S. intervention in Syria to assist the rebel groups fighting President Bashar Assad's government. Arguing against military strikes, I wrote that "Bashar Assad is clearly not an American ally. But does his ouster encourage stability in the Middle East, or would his ouster actually encourage instability?"

The administration's goal has been to degrade Assad's power, forcing him to negotiate with the rebels. But degrading Assad's military capacity also degrades his ability to fend off the Islamic State of Iraq and al-Sham. Assad's government recently bombed the self-proclaimed capital of ISIS in Raqqa, Syria.

To interventionists like former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, we would caution that arming the Islamic rebels in Syria created a haven for the Islamic State. We are lucky Mrs. Clinton didn't get her way and the Obama administration did not bring about regime change in Syria. That new regime might well be ISIS.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is not to say the U.S. should ally with Assad. But we should recognize how regime change in Syria could have helped and emboldened the Islamic State, and recognize that those now calling for war against ISIS are still calling for arms to factions allied with ISIS in the Syrian civil war. We should realize that the interventionists are calling for Islamic rebels to win in Syria and for the same Islamic rebels to lose in Iraq. While no one in the West supports Assad, replacing him with ISIS would be a disaster.

Our Middle Eastern policy is unhinged, flailing about to see who to act against next, with little thought to the consequences. This is not a foreign policy.

Those who say we should have done more to arm the Syrian rebel groups have it backward. Mrs. Clinton was also eager to shoot first in Syria before asking some important questions. Her successor John Kerry was no better, calling the failure to strike Syria a "Munich moment."

Some now speculate Mr. Kerry and the administration might have to walk back or at least mute their critiques of Assad in the interest of defeating the Islamic State.

A reasonable degree of foresight should be a prerequisite for holding high office. So should basic hindsight. This administration has neither.

But the same is true of hawkish members of my own party. Some said it would be "catastrophic" if we failed to strike Syria. What they were advocating for then—striking down Assad's regime—would have made our current situation even worse, as it would have eliminated the only regional counterweight to the ISIS threat.

Our so-called foreign policy experts are failing us miserably. The Obama administration's feckless veering is making it worse. It seems the only thing both sides of this flawed debate agree on is that "something" must be done. It is the only thing they ever agree on.

But the problem is, we did do something. We aided those who've contributed to the rise of the Islamic State. The CIA delivered arms and other equipment to Syrian rebels, strengthening the side of the ISIS jihadists. Some even traveled to Syria from America to give moral and material support to these rebels even though there had been multiple reports some were allied with al Qaeda.

Patrick Cockburn, Middle East correspondent for the London newspaper, the Independent, recently reported something disturbing about these rebel groups in Syria. In his new book, "The Jihadis Return: ISIS and the New Sunni Uprising," Mr. Cockburn writes that he traveled to southeast Turkey earlier in the year where "a source told me that 'without exception' they all expressed enthusiasm for the 9/11 attacks and hoped the same thing would happen in Europe as well as the U.S." It's safe to say these rebels are probably not friends of the United States.

"If American interests are at stake," I said in September, "then it is incumbent upon those advocating for military action to convince Congress and the American people of that threat. Too often, the debate begins and ends with an assertion that our national interest is at stake without any evidence of that assertion. The burden of proof lies with those who wish to engage in war."

Those wanting a U.S. war in Syria could not clearly show a U.S. national interest then, and they have been proven foolish now. A more realistic foreign policy would recognize that there are evil people and tyrannical regimes in this world, but also that America cannot police or solve every problem across the globe. Only after recognizing the practical limits of our foreign policy can we pursue policies that are in the best interest of the U.S.

The Islamic State represents a threat that should be taken seriously. But we should also recall how recent foreign-policy decisions have helped these extremists so that we don't make the same mistake of potentially aiding our enemies again.

When ISIS made the murder of James Foley into a YouTube video, they transported this outrage to the odd middle-world we inhabit between reality and pixels of reality. People don't ask if you saw the murder of James Foley. They ask if you've seen the video of his murder.

James Foley's beheading has reset this half-real world. After watching screens on their PCs, tablets and smartphones fill with one shocking image after another—Boko Haram's kidnapping of the girls in Nigeria, Russian rebels' shooting down Flight 17 above Ukraine, ISIS's one-week capture of one-third of Iraq, massacres of Yazidis and Christians, Islamic militias fighting to take over Libya, Hamas's casual sidewalk executions—most Americans realize the stakes in the world have become bigger than the four sides of a video.

The world has reframed the politics of the 2016 election.

National security and the U.S. role in the world has pushed toward the top of the decision tree in that election. That is why Hillary Clinton outputted an interview this summer with the Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg, repositioning her bland foreign-policy views to the right of Barack Obama. No more speeches about saving the oceans. That's why first-term Sen. Rand Paul used his time on "Meet the Press" last weekend to re-reposition Mrs. Clinton as a "military hawk."

Even Mr. Obama himself reacted to the new realities. Whether to staunch the president's political bleeding in the polls, which is threatening Democrats this November, or the nightmare of blood elsewhere, the U.S. government is reportedly preparing possible airstrikes against ISIS inside Syria and working to mobilize our "partners" in the region, such as Saudi Arabia.

Of course, the revolt of the Free Syrian Army against Bashar Assad has been on since early 2011, and Saudi Arabia concluded that being a partner of the U.S. was pointless.

These foreign-policy fiascoes, and many others, are laid at the feet of Barack Obama. And at the feet of former Secretary of State Clinton, who spent four years and a million miles in flight from all this.

Individual responsibility matters. The U.S. president is commander in chief even if he doesn't want to be commander in chief. If Mrs. Clinton believes what she told the Atlantic, she should have resigned and said what was on her mind then. But she didn't. Doing so would have imperiled her standing—not her standing with the American people, who were losing faith in Mr. Obama's handling of the world, but with the Democratic Party activists who would have demolished her presidential nomination in retaliation for exposing the Obama worldview, which is their worldview.

In a foreign-policy election, as it looks like we are going to have in 2016, the stakes are a lot higher than picking among the one-person brands who populate U.S. presidential politics now. Party matters. Party history and belief shapes foreign-policy decisions in a time of crisis. The word "fortitude" comes to mind.

So one must ask: Can the Democratic Party be trusted with U.S. national security from 2016 to 2020?

At the Republicans' 1984 convention, keynote speaker Jeane Kirkpatrick famously unloaded on the opposition party's foreign policy as "the San Francisco Democrats." What we have learned the past five-and-a-half years is that Jeane Kirkpatrick is still right. It isn't just Barack Obama. It's them. If anything, the modern Democratic Party is more hostile to national defense than it was in 1984.

Let us hypothesize that Mrs. Clinton is a Democratic hawk. Name one other office-holding hawk in the party? California Sen. Dianne Feinstein, sort of. Beyond these two women, none. Former Sen. Joe Lieberman, the party's vice presidential nominee in 2000? They joyously ran him out of the party in 2006. Sam Nunn ? The last of the South's great national-security Senate Democrats retired in 1996. Former Democratic Sen. Pat Moynihan served as a Republican president's U.N. ambassador. Democratic hawks, or even half-hawks, aren't an endangered species. They're extinct.

The military types, pundits and big donors who claim to have spotted appearances of Clinton hawkishness are deluding themselves. Bill Clinton of

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kosovo? In 2008, the progressive activists who organized and financed Mr. Obama's candidacy overthrew the Clintons ' centrist triangulation machine and took control of the party. Dutifully, Mrs. Clinton ran as an antiwar candidate.

Any hawklike initiative she might attempt will be vetted and opposed by the Obama-Warren Democrats in Congress and across the blogosphere. They abhor Mrs. Clinton's "international liberalism." The MoveOn.org website has posted an online petition exhorting President Obama to "Keep America Out of Iraq!" These hearts and minds belong wholly to the domestic-spending accounts. National security needs diminish their reason for being.

As to the Republicans, Rand Paul's foreign-policy minimalism remains a fringe movement, with multiple challengers. The Democrats have the opposite problem. What ought to be the party's foreign-policy fringe has seized its center, and no one in the party will challenge it. In times of peace, this tension between the we-won't-go left and everyone else gets indulged as a political videogame. Win some, lose some. In a world of spreading disorder, as now, that is asking too much.

The Daily Beast: Nick Gillespie: "Hillary's Got a Millennial Problem"

By Nick Gillespie

August 28, 2014

[Subtitle:] The former Secretary of State looks like she'll clobber a Republican like Rand Paul in 2016—but only if she doesn't alienate the young.

Sure, projecting a winner in a presidential election a couple of years in advance is a mug's game. But don't you know that Hillary Clinton has already won the 2016 contest? It's just like 2008 all over again: Hillary can't lose.

Seriously, though, it's obvious Hillary will win, especially when you look at the way she's currently trouncing leading Republicans such as Chris Christie and Rand Paul among young voters. The kids love Hillary, goes this line of thinking, and since they decided the 2012 election and will only ever vote Democratic, all we need to do now is reanimate Aretha Franklin, the Eagles, or one of her other mummified favorite performers for the inauguration.

But such triumphalism about Clinton and the Democratic stranglehold on younger voters is premature, to say the least. While there's no question that the GOP has managed to alienate millennials, there's every reason to believe that top Democrats are doing just about everything they can to squander their currently commanding advantage.

Over at FiveThirtyEight, Harry Enten averages a bunch of polls taken earlier this year and finds that the former first lady, senator, and secretary of state rolls over Christie on average by 10 points with all voters and a whopping 27 points with "young voters" (ages 18 to 29 or 34, depending on the poll).

For Paul, the shellacking is even worse, with Clinton beating him by 11 points overall and by 28 points with the kids. Enten argues that even though 45 percent of Americans have no idea who Rand Paul is, "it's not entirely clear Paul's numbers will drastically improve if young voters learn more about his positions." Paul and the kids may be on the same side when it comes to pot legalization, privacy, and war, but they seem to be at loggerheads when it comes to immigration, healthcare, and a host of other issues.

Apart from trying to look two years into the future—where was Barack Obama in 2006? or Bill Clinton in 1990?—the case against Rand Paul is largely irrelevant to Hillary Clinton's and the Democrats' own burgeoning youth problem. Thanks to truly epic Republican awfulness on just about every possible issue from gay marriage to foreign affairs to budget-busting, the Dems have indeed been able to take the kids for granted inrecent years. But that hasn't always been the case. Indeed, Republicans as different as Richard Nixon, Ronald Reagan, and George H.W. Bush all managed to win the youth vote. And consider that in 2000, George W. Bush and Al Gore split the 18-29 year old vote, each pulling 48 percent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two wars and The Patriot Act later, John Kerry won 54 percent of the youth vote in 2004. In 2008, Barack Obama snagged a whopping 66 percent of it, with John McCain pulling just 32 percent. Then things get interesting, though. In 2012, Obama pulled a relatively weak 60 percent of the 18-29 vote, with Mitt Romney bucking up to 36 percent. And Obama actually lost the youth vote among 18, 19, and 20 year olds to Mitt Romney, everyone's least favorite grandparent. According to George Washington University political scientist John Sides, Romney took 57 percent of 18 year olds, 59 percent of 19 year olds, and 54 percent of 20 year olds. It's not clear how those kids will vote (or if they'll vote) in 2016, but there's no reason to buy into the idea that the youth vote is locked up by the Democrats.

The Dems do need the youth vote. As Pew has pointed out, despite some slippage, young people overall still provided the generous cushion by which Obama beat Romney. Romney, like McCain before him, actually won voters 30 and over. In some important ways, then, the battle for the presidency may well be the battle for younger voters.

If Obama has lost support among younger voters, it seems likely that Clinton will also struggle to maintain a connection with them as a presidential campaign gets underway. To the extent she is a known quantity to younger voters, it's as Obama's secretary of state -- the face of a foreign policy that is simultaneously a self-evident failure and one that simply wasn't bellicose enough for Clinton's tastes.

Either way, that's no way to win the youth vote; neither is her generally uncritical support of a national-security state and her use of Edward Snowden as a "punching bag." Assuming that the GOP nominee is someone around the ages of Christie or Paul, she'll also be about 15 years older than her opponent, which flips the age-party relationship of the past two elections as well. And the Democrats' problems only get bigger if Clinton doesn't run: They've got virtually no other obvious ready-to-go candidates in the wings.

On top of that, there's still two more years of Obama to suffer through. As pollster John Zogby has written, the president has already alienated many young voters for a number of reasons. "First and foremost," he writes in Forbes, "is their deep distrust for all political authority and their disappointment in Mr. Obama himself. Second is the sense of a deep invasion of privacy and government overreach in their lives. And third is the Millennial style of wanting immediate answers to problems instead of bureaucratic stasis, as they see it."

If the economy stays flat or especially rough for younger Americans, or if we're plunged back into aimless wars without end, all that will make things tougher still for any Democrat in 2016 to easily win the youth vote. Especially if she is facing a youthful Republican who is OK with pot legalization and gay marriage, pro-privacy, anti-war, and seems to have a clue on economic policy.

There's no question that the Republican Party brand is all but dead to younger voters. As the recent Reason-Rupe poll on millennials found, just 23 percent of voters between the ages of 18 and 29 identify as Republican or lean Republican. Millennials are social liberals who favor gay marriage and pot legalization; if the GOPcan't come to terms with that, its future is indeed limited.

The corresponding youth-identification number for Democrats is 43 percent, which sounds good until you realize that it's still lower than the percentage of voters 30 years and old who identify as or lean Democratic (49 percent). Indeed, fully 34 percent of millennials identify as independent, compared to just 11 percent of older voters. Young voters are already not willing to vote Republican. In a few years, and absent a vibrant candidate who speaks to their concerns, they may well decide not to vote Democratic, either.

Indeed, the great political achievement of the 21st century so far has been to alienate young voters from the two major parties in the U.S. And the great task for both Democrats and Republicans in 2016 will be to figure out how to woo them back.

Mediaite: "Fox Host Thinks NY Times Is Doing Hillary's 'Bidding' by Not Endorsing Cuomo"

By Matt Wilstein

August 27, 2014, 6:29 p.m. EDT

On Tuesday, The New York Times editorial board announced that it would not be endorsing Governor Andrew Cuomo (D-NY) in his upcoming primary bid because of his "failure" to enact meaningful ethics reform. But Fox News host Andrea Tantaros thinks the paper declined to endorse Cuomo for a very different reason.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While Tantaros admitted that Cuomo “has had some shady ethics,” she wondered aloud, “Isn’t it interesting? Do you think they could be doing the bidding of, oh, I don’t know, Hillary Clinton to take out somebody who could potentially be a dark horse for 2016? I do.”

On a related note, Tantaros suggested that New Jersey Governor Chris Christie was refusing to financially support New York’s Republican gubernatorial candidate Rob Astorino because he’s “covering” for Cuomo. “I hope not,” she said.

By Tantaros’ logic, if The New York Times wants to help Hillary Clinton by hurting Andrew Cuomo, then it would only make sense that Christie would want to hurt Clinton by helping Cuomo.

Elle: “There's a Clothing Store Dedicated to Hillary Clinton's Pantsuits”

By Victoria Hoff

August 27, 2014, 2:00 p.m. EDT

Whether it's political success, her get-it-done attitude, or meta sense of humor, there are several ways we're sure many people would like to channel Hillary Clinton. But for those who find themselves constantly inspired by the former Secretary of State's rotating wardrobe of pantsuits and conservative formalwear, you're in luck: There is actually a boutique dedicated to Clinton's aesthetic—and it'll only take you a quick plane ride to Kosovo to get you there.

In Kosovo's capital city of Pristina, just around the corner from Bill Clinton Boulevard and a 10-foot statue of its namesake, sits Hillary—not the person, but the store, whose wares were inspired by the woman herself. (For those confused with this fondness for all things Clinton, the former President aided the country in its war with Yugoslavia.)

Yahoo's Jo Piazza not only blessedly alerted us to the boutique's existence, but also did us a real solid by actually visiting the place in person. She reports that two photos of the politician and author "hang proudly above the store's dressing rooms," and that the real highlight of its existence occurred in 2012, when Hillary herself paid a visit. (She was presented with a navy pantsuit.)

"We respect her name and her personality here," store owner Besian Morina told Piazza. "Our clothes are modeled after her own fashion." Hillary (again, the store, not the person) is apparently a favored destination for locals and tourists alike.

And the most popular item? A red pantsuit, natch.

New York Magazine blog: Daily Intelligencer: “Mitt, Again?”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Annie Lowrey

August 27, 2014, 12:56 p.m. EDT

Mitt Romney went on "The Hugh Hewitt Show" yesterday to say that he definitely-certainly-absolutely-not-well-maybe is running for president in 2016.

Hewitt: I wouldn't presume to ask you to say, "Yeah, I'm in the race." But circumstances change. And if you thought that in fact it were not that way, that you thought you were the only one who could do this, you'd change your mind, wouldn't you?

Romney: I'm not going there, Hugh. I know you're going to press, but you know, this is something we gave a lot of thought to when early on I decided we're not going to be running this time. And again, we said look, I had the chance of running. I didn't win. Someone else has a better chance than I do. And that's what we believe, and that's why I'm not running. And you know, circumstances can change, but I'm just not going to let my head go there. I remember that great line from Dumb and Dumber, where the…

Hewitt: So you're telling me I have a chance?

Romney: There you go, you remember. You're telling me I have a chance? That's one of a million.

Hewitt: Hey, all, the takeaway is already circumstances can change. I know how we're going to play this.

But here's the thing. Many Republicans — including, perhaps, Romney himself — do not believe that any of the candidates the party has on deck have a better chance than he does.

In part, that is because of the candidates' various intrinsic weaknesses. Chris Christie, for instance, seems a bully and a cheat, while Rand Paul sits too far out on the ideological fringe. And in part, it is because of Romney's considerable strengths: his name recognition, his money, his relatively broad appeal, his ties with party donors and kingmakers, and the number of his faithful urging him to go for it.

He also has the experience of running two campaigns, making him battle-tested in a way no other candidate would be. "I hope I would be a better candidate than I was last time," Romney said on Hewitt's show. "I mean, you hope you learn from your mistakes."

Some early poll numbers are also fueling the Mittmentum. Right now, Hillary Clinton is handily beating many of the front-of-the-pack Republican candidates in the most important swing states, as well as in the general election. Romney would lose to Clinton in the general, the polls show. But he would beat Obama, and he has some decent numbers in decisive states like New Hampshire.

Romney himself keeps on throwing kindling on the fire, too, ginning up press and winking every time he promises he would never run again. In the past few days, for instance, he has taken the ALS Ice Bucket Challenge and then sat down for an interview with the Washington Post. And he's spent the past few weeks crisscrossing the country, fund-raising, endorsing, and making appearances with Republican candidates. Those seem to be the actions of a restless, handsome billionaire in watchful-waiting mode, more so than the actions of a restless, handsome billionaire really and truly retiring from public life.

None of this is to say that Romney is likely to kick off a third campaign. But, to paraphrase Lloyd Christmas, what I'm saying is there is a chance.

The Hill: "Could Romney really run?"

By Peter Sullivan

August 27, 2014, 6:29 p.m. EDT

Mitt Romney is in demand, and it's raising speculation about another White House run, however far-fetched that might seem.

The 2012 GOP standard-bearer has been stumping across the country for Republican Senate candidates, highlighting his popularity two years after losing the Oval Office to Barack Obama.

A Netflix documentary, "Mitt," depicted Romney's run for the White House in 2008 and 2012 and his devotion to his family, warming him to GOP audiences further.

On policy, Russia's incursions into Ukraine have vindicated his tough stance in 2012, something Obama famously used to mock him as out of touch.

It's all causing the public to give him a second look.

Romney lost badly to Obama in the last presidential cycle, but a CNN/ORC poll in July found that if the election were held again, 53 percent of adults would vote for Romney, and just 44 percent for Obama.

Romney has repeatedly said he's not interested in running again, using the word "no" 11 times in a row in one January interview with The New York Times.

On Tuesday, Romney sounded a different note during an interview on "The Hugh Hewitt Show."

"Someone else has a better chance than I do," Romney said of the 2016 campaign, saying "that's why I'm not running.

"And you know, circumstances can change, but I'm just not going to let my head go there," Romney concluded.

It's just a sliver of an opening, but it got people talking, particularly given the wide-open race for the Republican nomination, for which there is no clear front-runner.

Furthermore, Republicans are looking for an establishment candidate as an option to Tea Party favorites like Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) and the libertarian-leaning Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.).

It's led GOP observers to say he has a good chance at the 2016 nomination.

"He's one of the very few people who can run and lock it up very early," said Patrick Hynes, a Republican operative in New Hampshire who advised Romney's 2012 campaign. "I think there's a great deal of good will behind him at the moment because there's buyer's remorse about President Obama."

"There's no clear frontrunner, so I certainly think he would be one of the early favorites if he were to decide to get in," said Bob Rafferty, a former chief of staff to Iowa Gov. Terry Branstad (R) and a 2012 Romney supporter.

Hard to believe? Look at the polls.

A Suffolk University poll of Republican Iowa caucus-goers released Wednesday found that Romney swamps the rest of the field, at 35 percent, compared to 9 percent for former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, who is in second place.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Romney says his reason for passing on another run is not that he does not want it. “I’d love to run for president. I loved running for president,” he said in the interview Tuesday.

Instead, Romney says the reason is that someone else has a better chance.

“Had I believed I would actually be best positioned to beat Hillary Clinton, then I would be running,” Romney said. “But I actually believe that someone new that is not defined yet, someone who perhaps is from the next generation, will be able to catch fire, potentially build a movement, and be able to beat Hillary Clinton.”

The standing of other Republican contenders is far from certain, though.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker are all tangled in controversies that could lead to criminal convictions. Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush might not even run, and Paul would have to win over the establishment to views that are out of the party’s traditional mainstream.

“Let’s say all the guys that were running all came together and said, ‘Hey, we’ve decided we can’t do it. You must do it.’ That’s the one out of a million we’re thinking about,” Romney said.

Stu Stevens, a senior adviser to Romney’s 2012 campaign, did not reject out of hand the possibility of a run when asked in an email for his thoughts on whether the former Massachusetts governor had a chance of winning the nomination again.

“Thanks for reaching out. But I pretty much stay away from 2016 speculation,” Stevens wrote in an email.

Another senior adviser, Kevin Madden, said Romney has been clear that he is not going to run.

“You have to measure the ‘circumstances can change’ comment against a much larger body of instances where he said emphatically that he’s not going to run again,” Madden said.

And of course, there are many hurdles Romney would have to face if he ran again.

His favorability has not improved since the 2012 election, staying fairly steady at 47 percent favorable and 43 percent unfavorable, in a February Gallup poll.

The video of his infamous “47 percent” comments still exists, and he still called for “self-deportation” for people in the country illegally, which could be major problems in the general election, if not in the primary.

However, Hynes, the New Hampshire operative, argued some of the same attacks, such as those over his business dealings at Bain Capital, would not work in another election.

“I don’t think the Bain stuff plays a second time around,” Hynes said. “Everybody knows who he is. We’re not going to find any new secrets about his business record.”

How Obama fares in the rest of his second term could also color views of Romney.

“Seems to me he's pretty clear that he doesn't intend to run, and if he opened the door at all with his comment it was the tiniest sliver under the most unlikely of circumstances,” David Kochel, senior adviser for Romney’s 2012 Iowa campaign, wrote in an email.

"That said, he'd make a great president, and I've believed that for a long time now," he added. "More Americans believe it too after seeing the repeated failures of the current president."

Subject:	Welcome Refugees--and Protect Them NOW. Before Thanksgiving, Call Your Senator to Urge the US to Welcome the Refugees

Tikkun to heal, repair and transform the world

empowered by salsa

A note from Rabbi Michael Lerner Join or Donate Now !

Please call your Senators to tell them you Welcome Syrian Refugees and urge them to vote "NO" if a bill comes to the Senate for a vote to make it more stringent to accept refugees from Syria and Iraq to the US. You can call the Capitol Switchboard on Monday or Tuesday at 202 224-3121. If you do not know the names of your two senators, just give the Capitol operator your state and you will be connected. You can also call their state offices by googling them to get the phone number.

Refugees coming to the US are already subject to lengthy, stringent clearance requirements. In the busyness of preparing for the holidays, let us not forget these are people who have lost everything. Imagine being bombed and having no place to go, and one after another country saying "we do not want you." It is winter, it is cold, and many are sleeping outside, waiting at the borders of several European countries. The countries that are doing the bombing - US, Russia, France, including the coalition of the willing who started it all with the Iraq war - have a responsibility to take in the refugees. We broke it, we own it, now we need to take care of the people whose lives have been destroyed by the wars we helped start (no, not just us, but also us--and we live in the wealthiest country in the world and can afford to take in a significant number of the homeless). And "no," these refugees do not present a danger to the general public--we already have careful poicies in place to ensure that we would not be accpeting people who are ISIS operatives intent on hurting us.

I never understood how the U.S. could have shut its doors to Jews attempting to flee Nazi Germany. I thought that after the Holocaust every American would understand the horrendous consequences of turning our backs on those who were seeking refuge. I'm glad that the Holocaust museum and many of the institutions of Jewish life have called for a receptive policy. Yet the U.S. Congress, in a vote that included almost all Republicans and some 50 plus Democrats, instead of voting to bring at least a million of the refugees to the U.S., has voted to make it harder for any of the millions of refugees to come here. A wave of fear has spread rapidly across the U.S. fostered in part by xenophobic and opportunistic politicians and a fear-oriented media (as they say in the mainstream media: "if it bleeds, it leads" on the news if we dare call it news anymore rather than just "entertainment"). Please read the statement of one such refugee below, and then call your U.S. Senator to urge them to reject the House measure and to use their access to media and communities in their own state to provide leadership on this issue and to educate their consituents to a generous and open-hearted welcoming of the refugees. Of course, we at Tikkun have been calling for a new approach to foreign policy for the past few decades--because we know that a Strategy of Generosity, manifested in a Global Marshall Plan www.tikkun.org/gmp, is a far more effective path than the Strategy of Domination and "power over" that has so far guided every U.S. Administration including the Obama Administration for the past 30 plus years. So now we see what happens when people dismiss "generosity" as utopian and instead embrace the "be realistic" mantra that leads so many good people to support militaristic policies. Now the best we can do is to open the gates of our country to some of the people who have been hurt by the policies we in the West have followed. The least we can do is take care of some of these refugees!

The words of a refugee

You' are 29 years old with a wife, two children and a job. You have enough money, and can afford a few nice things, and you live in a small house in the city.
Suddenly the political situation in your country changes and a few months later soldiers are gathered in front of your house. And in front of your neighbours' houses.
They say that if you don't fight for them, they will shoot you.
Your neighbour refuses.
One shot. That's it.

You overhear one of the soldiers telling your wife to spread her legs.
Somehow you get rid of the soldiers and spend the night deep in thought.
Suddenly you hear an explosion. Your house no longer has a living room.
You run outside and see that the whole street is destroyed.

You take your family back into the house, and then you run to your parents' house.
It is no longer there. Nor are your parents.
You look around and find an arm with your Mother's ring on its finger. You can't find any other sign of your parents.

"But asylum seekers have so many luxury goods! Smartphones, and designer clothes!"

You immediately forget it. You rush home, and tell your wife to get the children dressed. You grab a small bag, because anything bigger will be impossible to carry for a long time, and in it you pack essentials. Only 2 pieces of clothing each can fit in the bag.
What do you take?
You will probably never see your home country again.
Not your family, not your neighbours, your workmates…
But how can you stay in contact?

You hastily throw your smartphone and the charger in the bag.
Along with the few clothes, some bread and your small daughters favourite teddy.

"They can easily afford to get away. They aren't poor!"

Because you could see the emergency coming, you have already scraped all your money together.
You managed to save some money because of your well paid job.
The kind people smuggler in the neighbourhood charges 5,000 euros per person.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You have 15,000 euros. With a bit of luck, you'll all be able to go. If not, you will have to let your wife go.
You love her and pray that you the smugglers will take you all.
By now you are totally wiped out and have nothing else. Just your family and the bag.
The journey to the border takes two weeks on foot.

You are hungry and for the last week have barely eaten. You are weak, as is your wife. But at least the children have enough.
They have cried for the whole 2 weeks.
Half the time you have to carry your younger daughter. She is only 21 months old.
A further 2 weeks and you arrive at the sea.

In the middle of the night you're loaded onto a ship with other refugees.
You are lucky: your whole family can travel.
The ship is so full that it threatens to capsize. You pray that you don't drown.
The people around you are crying and screaming.
A few small children have died of thirst.
The smugglers throw them overboard.
Your wife sits, vacantly, in a corner. She hasn't had anything to drink for 2 days.
When the coast is in sight, you are loaded onto small boats.
Your wife and the younger child are on one, you and your older child are on another.

You are warned to stay silent so that nobody knows you're there.
Your older daughter understands.
But your younger one in the other boat doesn't. She doesn't stop crying.
The other refugees are getting nervous. They demand that your wife keeps the child quiet.
She doesn't manage it.
One of the men grabs your daughter, rips her away from your wife and throws her overboard.
You jump in after her, but you can't find her again.
Never again.
In 3 months she would have turned 2 years old.
Isn't that enough for you? They still have it too good here and have everything handed to them on a plate?

You don't know how you, your wife and your older daughter manage to get to the country that takes you in.
It's as though everything is all foggy. Your wife hasn't spoken a word since your daughter died.
Your older daughter hasn't let go of her sister's teddy and is totally apathetic.
But you have to keep going. You are just about to arrive at the emergency accommodation.
It is 10pm. A man whose language you don't understand takes you to a hall with camp beds. There are 500 beds all very close together.

In the hall it's stuffy and loud.
You try to get your bearings. To understand what the people there want from you.
But in reality you can barely stand up. You nearly wish that they had shot you.
Instead you unpack your meagre possessions:
Two items of clothing each and your smartphone.
Then you spend your first night in a safe country.
The next morning you're given some clothes.
Among the donated clothes are even branded 'label' clothes. And a toy for your daughter.
You are given 140 euros. For the whole month.

"They're safe here. Therefore they should be happy!"

Outside in the yard, dressed in your new clothes, you hold your smartphone high in the air and hope to have some reception.
You need to know if anyone from your city is still alive.
Then a 'concerned citizen' comes by and abuses you.
You don't know why. You don't understand "Go back to your own country!"
You understand some things like "smartphone" and "handed everything on a plate."
Somebody translates it for you.

And now tell me how you feel and what you own?
The answer to both parts of that is "Nothing."

Main Topics: Energy, McSame, Surrogates

Summary of Shift: Energy policy is at the forefront. McCain admits that tire inflation is an efficacious method for saving fuel. McCain's major surrogates emphasize McCain's all of the above approach for energy policy while deriding Obama's perceived opposition to nuclear and drilling. In the last few days, McCain has placed several ads in attempt to reclaim his lost maverick position. Pundits remain doubtful of this approach.

The Olympic torch arrives in Beijing with President Bush soon to follow. Firefighting in Northern California continues after a helicopter crash.

Highlights:

1. Surrogates expend energy on energy
   a. MSNBC: Giuliani: "John is quite specific about what he'll do and we know it from his record"
   b. CNN: Giuliani talks Iraq oil revenues and touts McCain's energy plans
   c. MSNBC: Fiorina attacks Obama on 2005 Energy bill, outlines McCain's plan
   d. MSNBC: Fiorina defends McCain on energy, senate record and against Dowd
   e. FNC: Rep. Eric Cantor stumps for McCain's energy plans
   f. MSNBC: Pfotenhauer attacks Obama's energy plan
2. ABC: McCain's new strategy emphasizes style over substance
3. CNN: The battle over who's the maverick: McCain's status scrutinized
4. McSame
   a. CNN: Begala highlights importance of framing election as "McCain is same as Bush"
   b. CNN: Those who don't like Bush don't seem to be equating dislike with McCain
   c. O'Reilly looks at whether McCain is throwing Bush under the bus and if this is effective
5. CNN: McCain's tricky balancing act, trying to not appear too negative
6. CNN: Carly Fiorina's effectiveness as a surrogate for McCain examined

Highlights, No Clips:

7. REIHAN SALAM: McCain really needs to get back to brass tacks and figure out how to connect with those blue collar working class voters. Go from beyond their cultural comfort with him, go to, 'I understand where you're coming from and here are policies that are going to work for you guys.'
8. CNN: The Cafferty File asks viewers the importance of the President of the United States knowing how to use the internet
9. MSNBC - OLBERMANN: After nearly a week, which he, his surrogates and the RNC spent mocking Obama for suggesting in response to a question tire inflation is a way to improve mileage and save lots of gas, Senator McCain has come out and endorsed tire inflation as a way to improve mileage and save lots of gas.

Highlight #1
Giuliani: "John is Quite Specific About What He'll Do and We Know it From His Record" (MSNBC 08/06/08 6:13pm)
DAVID GREGORY: . . . this is still a single digit race. Barack Obama has maintained a lead and yet . . . his poll numbers still remain in the forties . . . why do you think Barack Obama is not doing better? . . .

RUDY GIULIANI: I think he's not doing better because I think there's a major question about him that the American people are going to have to answer. And that is his experience . . . probably the least experience in the last 100 years . . . we need a person there who has been tested before and we know can handle these things and gives real answers to things . . . John is quite specific about what he'll do and we know it from his record.

GREGORY: When Sen. McCain talks about the energy crisis in this country, this has been a crisis that Republicans have failed, effectively, to find an answer to in all the time that George Bush has been president.

GIULIANI: This isn't about Republicans or Democrats, it's about who's going to be President of the United States.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

John McCain has been in favor . . . of cap and trade . . . before Barack Obama was even in the state legislature. So John has a long history here of supporting the things that he's talking about now . . . it's the difference between a man who has taken positions, I think usually correct but sometimes even wrong . . . and a person who doesn't seem to be able to do it . . .

GREGORY: . . .what is the particular risk of Obama as President . . .?

GIULIANI: . . . this country would be a country that's at drift . . . a big increase on taxes . . . a tax on the rich is a tax on the economy . . .

GREGORY: Let's talk about taxes and let's talk about the fact that Sen. McCain is offering himself to the country . . . as the "original maverick," he's the guy that stands up to power, he would stand up to George Bush. But you raised the issue of tax cuts just a minute ago. As recently as 2004, John McCain had a very different position, and this is what he said on Meet the Press . . .

JOHN MCCAIN: I voted against the tax cuts because of the disproportionate amount that went to the wealthiest Americans. I would, uh, clearly support not extending those tax cuts in order to help address the deficit.

GREGORY: . . . critics would say the maverick who is John McCain back in 2000, maybe even 2004, that's not the John McCain of today. He's switched his position n tax increases and tax cuts.

GIULIANI: John is still in a different place on cap and trade than the Republican Party. He was in a different place on Iraq, he was criticizing the administrations policy in Iraq, two, three and four years ago. Turns out he was absolutely right with the surge policy that the President adopted. I think on this tax issue that John realizes that this is not the time to be raising taxes, when the economy is in the situation that it's in. And then competitively it's not the time to do it, when just about all of Europe has a lower corporate tax rates than we do and we're competing for business . . .

GREGORY: But John McCain as recently as 2004 opposed the Bush tax cut. He changed that position. He talked about servicing the deficit. The deficit has ballooned since then. He is now in sync with George Bush on the position of tax cuts and he's using that as a hammer against Obama, when he's where Obama was effectively four years ago.

GIULIANI: I think that given the realities of our economy, John McCain is correct in saying that we shouldn't be raising taxes right now. But when you look at John McCain's overall record including his whole position on energy, climate change, John McCain has always taken the position that he thought was right, even when he thought it put him at odds with the administration.

GREGORY: But whether it's the war, whether its taxes, is he too close to George Bush to earn the maverick label today, as he did in 2000?

GIULIANI: If you ask Republicans, I think that was one of the major concerns with John, that he was too independent. I don' think you can use it against him. I mean, the fact that John has been an independent person, making his own decisions about things, where he agrees with President Bush, he's there 100% but where he disagrees, as he did on the war, he was a major critic until they actually changed positions and we went with the surge.

GREGORY: Well, let's talk about that. Obviously Sen. McCain did express concerns about the implementation of the war; he backed the war. Is it a mistake politically for him to spend so much time debating the wisdom or the success of the surge when so many Americans are still asking questions about why we went to war in Iraq in the first place. That's the decision that remains unpopular.

GIULIANI: I think what it displays about John McCain, whether you agree with him or not on the war or on the surge, and I do . . . I think it displays the fact that he can take a position. I think Sen. Obama has much more trouble doing that . . . the issue right now is the economy and it's energy. But I think you see that same difference. John McCain is willing to say, "These are my positions on energy." . . .

GREGORY: Let me ask you about VP candidates. Romney has been mentioned . . . is that a good choice for McCain?

GIULIANI: I think John has to make his own choice . . .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GREGORY: . . . in some of the advertisements, Sen. McCain has been relying on images of Britney Spears and Paris Hilton . . . Paris Hilton has come out with a response of her own . . .

GREGORY: Was it a smart idea for McCain to pick a fight with Paris Hilton?

GIULIANI: [laughs] I think she was kind of diplomatic about—if anything, I think she's supporting John McCain . . .

Giuliani Talks Iraq Oil Revenues and Touts McCain's Energy Plans (CNN 08/06/08 4:34pm)
WOLF BLITZER: […] Shocking general accounting office report that just came out, how much money the Iraqis are taking in, thanks to the large -- the high price of oil. […] and the GAO says that money is in the bank. They're spending a tiny, tiny bit of it. The United States is still spending about $12 billion a month. Here's the question, are American taxpayers right now being played for suckers?

RUDY GUILIANI: Well, I think the reality is that that's an opportunity. An opportunity for us to work with Iraq to get them to use that money, or more of that money for their own infrastructure, to kind of push them in that direction. It's kind of silly, though, for Barack Obama to suggest that's the cause of our energy crisis. […]

BLITZER: There's a lot of oil and they could make that oil available to the United States at a discount price.

GIULIANI: That would be very nice and that would help. It would also if Barack Obama would support offshore drilling, it would help if he would support nuclear power. It would help if he had a really comprehensive program instead of saying no to basically everything. It's kind of like deflecting.

BLITZER: But you're a politician. People hear, the Iraqi's have $80 billion, simply lying around. They're making a windfall on all this oil they're exporting. The United States is still footing the bill basically for everything they need.

GIULIANI: A great opportunity for us to lean on them more to foot more of the bill.

BLIZTER: Should they start paying the United States back, the $700 billion dollars the United States taxpayers have spent since the war started?

GIULIANI: Personally? I think the better way to handle this is for them to take over a much larger percentage of the expenses that are taking place right now. I think that would be a very sensible thing to do. There's a good opportunity for rearrangement of that. It doesn't make sense, though […]

BLITZER: The Sons of Iraq, the Sunni former insurgents, about 90,000 of them, they're now on the U.S. government payroll. We're paying them every month, according to general Petraeus, about $200 million a year. The United States is paying them to be quiet, to be supportive. Why aren't the Iraqi's paying them?

GIULIANI: Maybe they should. Maybe this is a good opportunity to move that over to their side of the ledger and have them pick up more of the expenses. In a way, it shows things are working in Iraq. Let's take advantage of that. But the point that I'm making it, it really is an example of demagoguery to try to make that cause of our issue with credit.

BLITZER: Well, he's not trying to make it the cause, but he's saying it's one issue that could certainly help the U.S. if the Iraqi's made that oil available, either for free or at a discount?

GIULIANI: It kind of gets them off the hook for the bigger issues, where he's basically been obstructionist, offshore drilling and nuclear power.

BLITZER: Should Senator McCain, he spoke out about this GAO report today, should Senator McCain be speaking out and telling the Iraqi's, you know what, this is simply unacceptable.

GUILIANI: I think it's something that should become part of the dealings between US and Iraq. I think Iraq should take over more of the responsibility for this. But as I said before, I think it's really insulting the intelligence of the American people to kind of make it part of our energy crisis when there are far bigger issues involved.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[…] Sure. The guy who voted for the big subsidies for the oil companies was Barack Obama. John McCain voted against it when they had a chance to vote. This is, again, part of the sort of faint strategy, this sort of push things off.

BLITZER: You're referring to the 2006 legislation which President Bush pushed for, McCain opposed, Obama supported it because it did have what he called environmentally sound proposals.

GIULIANI: But john McCain was in favor of environmental approach to oil and gas before Barack Obama, I think in the state legislature, going back to the 1990s. This is an issue which I think john McCain is winning the battle. He's winning it on energy in general which is why I think Barack Obama is doing this kind of demagoguery.

BLITZER: I guess one of the biggest criticisms Obama's making of McCain is the system is broken right now. There's been no serious effort over the past 30 years to find -- to make America energy independent, to wean the addiction from middle east oil off. He said of the past 30 years, McCain has been in Washington for 26. And he says McCain has done nothing to ease this problem on the United States.

GIULIANI: Well, actually, he's the one that's opposing the things that would in fact give us some degree of energy diversity, energy independence. It's true, for the last 30 years we haven't licensed a nuclear power plant. France is 80% nuclear. China is building 40 new nuclear power plants. McCain proposes to build 45 nuclear plants, Obama is still thinking about it. He's the one who actually wants to take us back to the past. McCain has talked about opening up offshore drilling. Obama opposes that, he's the one who would keep us exactly where we are now. And John has shown the independence to disagree with the President when he disagrees and agrees with him when he does. So I think, actually on this issue, this is the reason why the polls are so close and McCain is gaining. I think john McCain is outlining an energy policy that would break us from the past, and I think Obama is talking about the same old thing, basically Dr. No.

BLITZER: I'll ask you the same question I asked Mitt Romney yesterday. Is there anything in the 26 years he's been in Washington that you can point to senator McCain that has taken the lead in trying to achieve energy independence?

GIULIANI: Sure. He may be certainly the first republican, one of the first senators to be in favor of cap on trade. Going back to the 1990 s. along with senator Lieberman, he helped craft the legislation that's been proposed several times. John has taken the lead in energy over and over again. Again, before Barack Obama I think was in the state legislature.

BLITZER: At least you had an answer for that. When I asked Mitt Romney yesterday, he said he's not a historian. […]

Fiorina Attacks Obama on 2005 Energy Bill, Outlines McCain's Plan (MSNBC 08/06/08 1:03pm)
ANDREA MITCHELL: John McCain is going nuclear on the war between his energy policy and Barack Obama's by slamming Obama's position on nuclear energy.

JOHN MCCAIN: Barack Obama has said that expanding our nuclear power plants, quote, "doesn't make sense for America," unquote. He also says no to nuclear storage and no to reprocessing. I could not disagree more. Nuclear power isn't enough and drilling isn't enough. And we need to do all this and more. It's time that the congress went back to Washington and went about the people's business.

MITCHELL: . . . let's talk about Sen. McCain and his energy plan and what he said. This is what Barack Obama . . . said about McCain's energy plan . . .

BARACK OBAMA: Sen. McCain's energy plan reads like another Christmas list for oil and gas lobbyists. It's no wonder because many of his top advisors are former oil and gas lobbyists. The price he paid for his party's nomination has been to reverse himself on position after position. And now he embraces the failed Bush policies of the last eight years. The politics that helped break. That doesn't meet my definition of a maverick.

MITCHELL: John McCain has been describing himself as a maverick in his latest ads. Perhaps that quotation, that part of the speech today . . . has caused you to convert and jump ship?

CARLY FIORINA: No. I find that whole segment you just played kind of unbelievable. First of all, it was Barack

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obama who voted for the 2005 Bush/Cheney Energy Bill which was packed with giveaways to big oil companies over two and a half billion dollars with. John McCain voted against—

MITCHELL: A lot of folks say that isn't the case when you fact check that bill. The bill had a lot for, for, uh, alternative energy but not that much for oil and gas.

FIORINA: Yes, but it absolutely had some things for alternative energy but it also had over $2.5 billion worth of giveaways for big oil. Barack Obama voted for that bill. John McCain voted against it. John McCain's record as a maverick is long and clear. He has stood up against his party on many occasions. Not just the Bush and Cheney energy bill. Uh, let's see, immigration reform, campaign finance reform, he stood up against Bush-Cheney on the prosecution of the Iraq War. The list goes on and on. And by the way, it was John McCain who first called or stopping the fill of the strategic petroleum reserve. Barack Obama was against it then. It was John McCain who called for a gas tax holiday to give Ameicans relief. Barack Obama was against it then, continues to be against it—

MITCHELL: A lot of folks say that was a gimmick Carly.

FIORINA: You know, it's interesting to me that everyone is decrying the price that Americans are paying at the pump. Barack Obama has even suggested that we need a second stimulus package because the first one was eaten up by prices at the pump. And yet, the way to give Americans direct relief at the pump is to give them a gas tax relief. Barack Obama's against it. He's against nuclear energy. John McCain is absolutely right. He's against offshore drilling. The reality is—

MITCHELL: Well, actually, Barack Obama has a much more . . . you might called it nuanced position on nuclear energy. He has been a big supporter of nuclear energy back in Illinois. Exelon, as you know, is headquartered in Illinois. Some people have criticized him as being too in much in favor of nuclear energy. It's not that clear cut . . .

FIORINA: I guess I don't really—it's interesting then that he would attack John McCain for supporting nuclear energy. I frankly don't know what a nuanced approach to energy is. I think what John McCain is saying, in very clear cut fashion, is we need to do all of the above. If we are going to free ourselves from our dependence on foreign oil, we must invest in alternative energy sources. We must invest in green technologies. Absolutely. We must also invest in nuclear power. We must also invest in drilling. We must invest in clean coal, we must invest in natural gas. We have to do all of the above in order to achieve energy independence.

MITCHELL: You mentioned the 2005 bill. The 2005 bill had more than $18 billion dollars in incentives to the nuclear power industry. John McCain has talked about 45 new nuclear plants by 2030. The 2005 bill gave all these incentives to the nuclear power industry. And although the price of oil has gone up and up and up, nuclear power ought to be more competitive but there are so many insurance and liscencing problems. Not a single plant has been started or given a green light despite what was put in that bill three years ago . . . isn't it going to take a lot longer than John McCain is suggesting to get anywhere near 45 new nuclear plants in this country?

FIORINA: Well, I think it will start with a decision and leadership and the will in Washington to say we must achieve energy independence and nuclear power is part of the solution and right now, we don't have that. A President John McCain would give us that. 45 nuclear power plants is not only critically important to helping us achieve energy independence but it's worth about 700,000 jobs. In other words, John McCain's energy plan is not just about weaning ourselves from foreign oil. It's also an important part of getting this economy going again and making sure that we're creating jobs. And frankly, that's why I find it so, um, odd that Barack Obama is claiming that he has an energy plan, when, in essence what he's done is been against virtually everything. Against offshore drilling, against nuclear power. Yes, alternative energies and green technologies are an important part of the solution but for him to suggest—

MITCHELL: He has certainly moderated his position on offshore drilling, as had John McCain earlier. Let me show you what one of the potential running mates had to say, just last night on CNN . . . when Wolf asked Mitt Romney what proposals, what legislative accomplishments McCain has produced . . .

WOLF BLITZER: Can you cite one legislative accomplishment that Sen. McCain produced during those 26 years in Washington in order to achieve energy independence?

MITT ROMNEY: Well, I'm not a historian that goes through all of the pieces of legislation that John McCain has worked on.

MITCHELL: Carly, don't you think that Romney could have had a better response as a surrogate for John

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain than that he's not a historian? It's sort of reminds people of that old clip of Dwight Eisenhower when asked what Richard Nixon had accomplished when he was his running mate.

FIORINA: You know I found the question frankly a little odd because I think the point of the energy debate going on right now with the American people is what must we do now given where we are. The reason—

MITCHELL: Isn't John McCain's record in 26 years in the senate also one of the issues people will be using to decide whether or not to support him?

FIORINA: Absolutely. And I think John McCain's record of 26 years is an incredibly rich one; not only of legislative accomplishment, but also of reaching his hand across the aisle and achieving those accomplishments in a bipartisan way. And I cited just a few minutes ago many examples of that, whether it was immigration reform or whether it was taking on Jack Abramoff and making sure the corruption that was going on in his own Republican party was uncovered and punished. I think if the suggestion is that somehow let's put John McCain's legislative record up against Barak Obama's that is a comparison that we would welcome in the McCain campaign.

MITCHELL: Now John McCain has got the new ad which talks about him as a maverick; the ad that came out yesterday I guess Maureen Dowd in today's New York Times says that this is not the John McCain that people remember; she speaks of McCain's green-eyed monster quote, "John McCain is pea-green with envy" and she says that's the only explanation for why a man that prides himself on honor; a man that vowed not to take the low road in the campaign, having been mugged by W. and Rove and South Carolina in 2000 is engaging in a festival of juvenilia; talking, of course, about Paris Hilton and other ads. What's your response to a lot of the criticism of John McCain; somebody is saying you know, John we hardly knew ya. You're not the John McCain of 2000 and you've been rough and tough in this campaign season.

FIORINA: First of all, Maureen Dowd, of course, always has a way with words; uh, secondly I think that comparing the Paris Hilton ad to some of what went on around John McCain and his family in South Carolina in the year 2000, is frankly ridiculous. Third, I think the ads that John McCain has put out have been humorous, they have been honorable, there is no question that Barack Obama is a celebrity, and there is also no question that is legitimate to ask whether he is ready to lead, so I think we're proud of the campaign we're running and I would just point out that John McCain didn't make it through the primaries in 2000, and today, as we speak, this race is running neck and neck. So something that John McCain is doing is working a resonating with the American people who ultimately, with all respect to Maureen Dowd, are going to be the ones that decide this election.

Rep. Eric Cantor Stumps For McCain's Energy Plans (FNC 08/06/08 5:28pm)
REP ERIC CANTOR: […] If the question is about Barack Obama's attacks on John McCain and whether, somehow his plan was based on suggestions from energy lobbyists, I think again, that shows a lack of understanding of what the American people are going through. I mean, right now there is a lot of hurt out there. Gasoline prices are way too high, families are buckling up under the pressure of paying 60, 70, 80 dollars every time they come into a gas station. John McCain has got in place a plan called the Lexington project, which is a comprehensive plan to relieve the pain at the pump, and to get us on the path towards energy independence which will eliminate our reliance on foreign oil, especially from regimes that are hostile to us.

Pfotenhauer Attacks Obama's Energy Plan (MSNBC 08/06/08 11:13am)
CONTESSA BREWER: John McCain dismisses Barack Obama as just a celebrity, like Paris Hilton. Oh, and Paris Hilton doesn't like that . . .

BREWER: John McCain says he thinks the ad was HA-larious, but is any of this back and forth helping America, for instance, solve the energy crisis? . . . what did you think of Paris Hilton's spoof ad?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Well, I thought it was pretty funny. You know, it's interesting to note that she must be part of the 70% of American people who support John McCain's all of the above approach to solving the energy crisis that we're facing and obviously the contrast here is that Sen. Obama, well both candidates support alternative energy, hydro, wind, electric, alternative fuels and are really very supportive of those aspects of a long term plan but only Sen. McCain has the foresight to support increased domestic production in oil and natural gas and nuclear power.

BREWER: Nancy, you just said that both candidates believe in exploring these alternative energies. So, why is the McCain campaign trying so hard to make Obama's full energy plan about inflating the tires properly?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

PFOTENHAUER: This is the aspect of, what'd we do right now? How do we solve our problem in the short to mid-term, not just the long term? These alternative sources we believe all need to be part of the solution, if you will. But in the short term, it's just plain irresponsible to not support increased domestic production in oil, natural gas and to take the steps to support nuclear power. That's a zero emission clean source of energy. Even Patrick Moore, the cofounder of Greenpeace supports it. That's the kind of thing that needs to be done. So there's a big chunk missing from Sen. Obama's approach and I think it shows very poor judgment on his part.

BREWER: Op-ed columnist, Maureen Dowd wrote in The New York Times today, "The Arizona senator who built his reputation on being a brave proponent of big solutions is running a schoolyard campaign about tire gauges and Paris Hilton, childishly accusing his opponent of being too serious, too popular and not patriotic enough." Is there a danger here in trying to entertain voters and belittling what people think is a really important campaign about really important issues?

PFOTENHAUER: You can chalk this up as one more time I disagree with Ms. Dowd. Which wou—I don't think I've ever agreed with her so that's not too remarkable. But the American people hear John McCain every day talk about real solutions to the challenges that we're facing. And you can talk about the energy aspect of what we're facing and he's got the all of the above approach that the American people support and that's warranted by the challenges that we face. Or we can talk about the economy overall where you've got Sen. McCain talking about keeping taxes low and keeping federal spending low and pursuing free trade and you've got Sen. Obama raising taxes in a weak economy, massive increases in federal spending and really, the most pretentious candidate, major candidate for president that I've witnessed in a long time.

KATIE COURIC: 90 days now 'til America elects a new president and Democrat Barack Obama is holding on to a small lead over Republican John McCain . . .

DEAN REYNOLDS: With John McCain increasingly on offense and Barack Obama more and more on defense, the two candidates appear to be fighting each other to a standstill in their attempts to brand the other guy as the wrong choice. While our poll says that registered voters want the candidates to be focusing more on domestic issues than foreign affairs.

JOHN MCCAIN: It's time to get America's economy moving again.

BARACK OBAMA: It's time to get a plan for ending the age of oil in our time.

REYNOLDS: 7 out of 10 of them believe the candidates are not addressing the issues that matter most to them. And that could be because they're hearing as much or more about persona than policy.

[. . .]

REYNOLDS: As for McCain, he's making a determined effort to make Obama's popularity and enhanced world status into laugh lines. McCain's campaign has been playing offense much more aggressively than Obama and emphasizing style a bit more than ever over substance.

[. . .]

REYNOLDS: Today at Marshall University for example, McCain spent three times as long talking to the Thundering Herd football team as he did talking issues to workers a cabinet making company. The man who rides the Straight Talk Express took no questions from reporters. Some Republicans wonder about the new approach. McCain's own mother said that using Paris Hilton in this controversial ad to insult Obama was, quote, "kind of stupid."

REYNOLDS: And now it appears mother knows best.

The Battle Over Who's The Maverick, McCain's Status Scrutinized (CNN 08/06/08 7:44pm)

KITTY PILGRIM: The sort of Maverick, everyone looking to take credit for the maverick credential, it's because Americans are presumably are so dissatisfied with policy.

KEITH RICHBURG: I think the Republican brand, this year, is toxic for a lot of people. So McCain has to get back to what he lost last week when he got mired in the Britney Spears/Paris Hilton ad. He's got to get back to saying, I'm not partisan, I'm a solutions guy, I can reach across the aisle. He lost that a little bit, I think, and he's trying to reclaim that.

PILGRIM: It's been kind of bitter back and forth all week.

MICHAEL GOODWIN: But I think for Obama […] it does reflect something that most of the discussions in the last week or so have been on McCain's turf. They've been about energy where, the drilling issue, where McCain clearly has an advantage. They've been about Iraq. So I think Obama's looking to get back into his comfortable turf which is, this is George Bush's third term […] trying to link him to Bush again.

ED ROLLINS: There are two big issue which McCain was out of sync with his own party. One was the tax issue, one of two republicans to vote against Bush's tax cuts which is heresy in the Republican party. And the immigration, where he basically formed his alliance with Kennedy. But everything else, I think he's been, he's got an 85 percent conservative voting record over his long career. But those are two big fundamental issues to which have switched on.

PILGRIM: But Ed, the voting record, many people won't bother to examine. They'll just sort of take these.

ROLLINS: Well, he's enjoyed the impression of being, I'm not beholden to anybody, I stand up here, I'm independent. And that's an interesting place to be.

Begala Highlights Importance of Framing Election As "McCain Is Same As Bush" (CNN 08/06/08 5:30pm)

ALEX CASTELLANOS: […] John McCain has an advantage, he's been around a long time, I think Paul's writing a book about this. And so, we've seen him tested. So in a moment of stress for the country, when you need presidential leadership, you have a sense hey, I know this guy. And that's why McCain can change positions on an issue and say, you know, well we still know who this guy is. Barack Obama is a little bit like that bright shiny packaging on a Christmas present, we get all excited at first but eventually you want to know what's inside and we still don't.

PAUL BEGALA: […] I think his campaign has to show the core of John McCain. Alex is right, McCain has a core, it's called George W. Bush. At his core McCain is a third term of Bush. If Obama's campaign will do more to define that core of McCain as Bush, then I think he's got a better chance of winning the election.

WOLF BLITZER: But he's disagreed with Bush on a lot of substantive issues.

BEGALA: Not a lot, 91 percent of the time over the Bush presidency, 91 percent of the time. Now if a guy bats right-handed 91 percent of the time do we call him a left-handed hitter? No. 91 percent of the time, I mean, come on. […]

BLITZER: That's one of the main arguments of the Obama campaign, if you've like the eight years of Bush vote for McCain.

CASTELLANOS: Sure, they'd much rather run against George Bush than John McCain, because John McCain is hard to beat. Look, there recently was survey in which they tested Barack Obama running against George Bush, and Barack Obama running against John McCain. You know what, John McCain was in a much, dead heat in that race against Barack Obama. Bush was losing by about 20 points, why, because the American people understand John McCain's a maverick, he's different, he speaks his own mind, and that's the difference.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BLITZER: Do you agree that the Republicans lucked out that McCain is their nominee?

BEGALA: He's by far their strongest nominee, but this is why it's all the more important for the Obama campaign to define McCain. If this campaign becomes only a referendum of Barack Obama, that's bad for Barack, he needs to make it a referendum of John McCain and George Bush.

Those Who Don't Like Bush Don't Seem To Be Equating Dislike with McCain (CNN 08/06/08 7:05pm)
BILL SCHNEIDER: Every forecasting model for this election predicts a democratic landslide. Strange then, when you ask voters to choose between Barack Obama and John McCain, the polls show a very close race. Imagine if President Bush were running for re-election or if Dick Cheney were running to succeed him? Can you say blowout? John McCain is a republican but he's not part of the Bush administration, as he takes pains to make clear.

MCCAIN: We've disagreed over the conduct of the war in Iraq and the treatment of detainees. Over out of control government spending and budget gimmicks. Over energy policy and climate change.

SCHNEIDER: A whopping 3/4 's of Americans believe things are going badly in the country. Voters who feel that way have a very low opinion of President Bush, but their displeasure does not seem to extend to McCain. They kind of like him. Barack Obama is new, he's young, he's relatively inexperienced. A lot of viewers see Obama as risky business. […] Obama is promising change, the downside to change is risk. If you want change, you have to take risks. […]

O'Reilly Looks At Whether McCain is Throwing Bush Under the Bus and If This Is Effective (FNC 08/06/08 8:04pm)
BILL O'REILY: Is John McCain throwing the Bush administration under the bus? […] With President Bush way down in the polls the Obama campaign is doing everything it can to link the President with Senator McCain. That could be an effective strategy. So the McCain people have a new ad, saying this [ad shown]. […] The question for tonight is about McCain's strategy, is it smart for him to openly say Washington is broken and by implication criticize Mr. Bush's leadership. I don't think that is smart for a number of reasons. First, some conservatives still like the President and are skeptical about McCain and that's not the way to win them over. Second, McCain's emphasis should be on solving vexing problems not assigning blame for what has gone wrong. That's what Obama is doing. Independent voters, the ones that will decide the next election, want hope not blame. McCain should be giving voters as much hope as possible, while at the same time emphasizing the inexperience of his opponent. Again, this election is about Barack Obama, yes or no on him. All McCain has to do is provide a steady alternative, be a secure presence. […]

DICK MORRIS: […] First, let me do a factual correction on the Obama ad. The reason McCain didn't support tax cuts for a hundred million households was they didn't pay any taxes. Those are people that pay zero taxes.

O'REILLY: But Obama is going to give them money back.

MORRIS: Ok, but it's hard to cut what they don't pay. I believe this is the best ad McCain has run. And I think it's a big mistake for Obama to answer. So I disagree with you on both counts. On the first part, McCain has got to prove he's not Bush's third term. He's got a 27 percent approval rating, Bush does. And you need 50 percent of the vote. And he's going to get the 27 percent, those are die-hard republicans, whatever he does. What he's got to do is to show that he is not Bush and that he can reach out to the other party. That's why I believe the greatest move for McCain would be to put Joe Lieberman on his ticket for vice president. […] And I think McCain has recaptured the maverick role that he played in 2000, when everyone saw him running against George Bush. And by talking about tobacco companies, and oil companies, and drug companies, he's hitting that populist message. Two wings to the Republican Party, the country club and the populist. And he's aligning with the populist against Bush, which is essentially the country club. […] People are going to eventually split the difference. They're going to say yeah, he's not George Bush but he's not a total maverick in the middle. And that's going to be enough for McCain to get the votes that Obama alienates.

You need to kick Bush to show that you're independent. And when you say we're worse than we were four years ago, and Washington is broken, that's a great way of telling the voters I'm kicking Bush, you can trust me to be as good as Obama.

McCain's Tricky Balancing Act, Trying to Not Appear Too Negative (CNN 08/06/08 4:25pm)
WOLF BLITZER: […] Our brand new CNN Opinion Research Corporation Poll shows many of you think they'll both be risky. 57 percent for Obama, 54 percent for McCain. But McCain's campaign would surely like those numbers to change in McCain's favor.

ED HENRY: While Barack Obama is trying to build himself as the candidate of change, John McCain is trying to seize that mantle back. A new one, two punch from John McCain.

JOHN MCCAIN: The cost of everything is going up and in the face of this Washington is on vacation.

HENRY: First McCain is on the attack, charging government is broken and Barack Obama is too inexperienced to fix it.

MCCAIN: My opponent, Senator Obama, opposes both storage and reprocessing of spent nuclear fuel, he opposes offshore drilling immediately, and he's out of touch.

HENRY: At the same time McCain is trying to present a positive agenda, making the case he has better plans to improve the economy and solve the energy problem.

MCCAIN: We need to crack down on those who've abused our credit market and caused this housing decline. We need to take action to support American businesses so that we can stop jobs from going overseas.

HENRY: A tricky balancing act for McCain, who may come across as too negative. He's walking that same fine line in a new ad that again charges Obama is a celebrity, but with a forward looking twist.

This ad is toned down, no images of Paris Hilton who was in last weeks ad and prompted so much outrage in the Obama camp. Nevertheless, the previous celebrity ad has sparked a humorous response from none other than Paris Hilton.

Trying to go positive and negative at the same time may be a tough balancing act for McCain. Whenever he attacks Washington, Obama reminds audiences that Senator McCain has been in Washington for 26 years. The challenge for McCain is to restore his old reputation as a maverick, not an insider.

Carly Fiorina's Effectiveness As a Surrogate for McCain Examined (CNN 08/06/08 8:49pm)
CAMPBELL BROWN: […] Carly Fiorina wants women to vote for John McCain. […] Fiorina had her own trouble staying on message.

DANA BASH: It's barely 8am, Carly Fiorina has already flown into Georgia, she's in a hurry. […] 18 months ago John McCain asked her to advice him on economics, but her urgent task this day, selling McCain to women voters. A roll tailor-made for Fiorina. She was the first female CEO of a high-tech company, Hewlett Packard. She has lots of female fans. […] Fiorina is using her star power to draw women to listen about McCain.

CARLY FIORINA: So I have known him since 2000. In his Senate office, women have both higher positions and are higher paid on average than the men in his office.

BASH: She talks about women's issues you don't hear much elsewhere.

FIORINA: He was a co-sponsor of the women's equal opportunity act. […]

BASH: She is a newcomer to politics, mistakes happen. […] She recently told reporters that women ask her why doesn't health insurance cover birth control if it covers Viagra. It caught McCain by surprise. […] Fiorina insists her point, that women want a say in choices in health coverage is valid. […]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Looking back, do you think it would have been better, given what happened, to talk about meditation and valium as opposed to use the Viagra word in this political situation.

FIORINA: Well, I in some ways, I'm quite surprised it caused such a flab. I mean, all you have to do is watch your network, CNN, and see endless ads, ad after ad after ad, for what we are euphemistically calling male enhancement. But, I understand, it was perhaps too memorable an example.

BASH: But it's not just the Viagra dustup. In Ohio recently, Fiorina said that "McCain has never signed on to efforts to overturn Roe v. Wade." But the fact is that McCain calls for Roe v. Wade's reversal right on his website.

Your critics say, well, you're doing that to try to lure women voters, even thought it doesn't really represent Senator McCain's position.

FIORINA: The reality is we have had seven years of a republican Congress and a republican President, and Roe v. Wade is still the law of the land. […]

BASH: […] Fiorina tells us about searching for Hillary Clinton voters, skeptical of Barack Obama. She recently met some.

FIORINA: They sent me a message on my website one day, and they said we really want to talk to you.

BASH: But if this former CEO knows anything it's data, and polls show that women are breaking for Obama not McCain. Still, she's off to hunt for McCain voters and avoid controversy.

Agreed. I was at the AFL-CIO last night to welcome Franken, and ran into a lot of similar comments and concerns, and a mix of thoughts on how calculated Obama's position was. If it was planned, I don't think it was widely discussed.

I thought John's response at NBC was right on target. Focusing less on the tariff itself and instead drilling down on how to make sure we don't shift our emissions over seas, to my mind, offers the best chance of addressing the issue without inflaming protectionist fears.

Our Incoherent China Policy:
The proposed Trans-Pacific Partnership is bad economics, and even worse as containment of China.

By Clyde Prestowitz

In the summer of 2009, I was invited with a few other policy analysts to the White House for a briefing on the newly proposed Trans Pacific Partnership (TPP). At that time, the potential participants included Canada, Mexico, Peru, Chile, New Zealand, Australia, Singapore, Brunei, Malaysia, Vietnam, and, of course, the United States. Whether or not Japan would be invited to join had not yet been decided.

Noting that the United States already had free trade agreements with Canada, Mexico, Peru, Chile, Australia, and Singapore, I asked why we needed an agreement that added only the tiny economies of New Zealand, Brunei, Malaysia, and Vietnam. The reply from a member of the National Security Council staff was that it would reassure our Asian allies that America was back; that this agreement would be the economic complement to the increased military deployments of the recently announced "Pivot to Asia" foreign policy, obviously aimed at counterbalancing the spread of Chinese power and influence. Along with health care and a possible treaty on nuclear weapons with Iran, TPP would be a major part of the president's hoped-for legacy.

Wall Street Journal: US Spied on Bibi During Iran Deal Talks

The U.S. maintained National Security Agency surveillance on Israeli officials, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu during nuclear negotiations with Iran, the Wall Street Journal reported Tuesday in an exclusive that exposes the extent of cooperation and mistrust between the two allies. According to the report, despite vowing to freeze surveillance on allies in 2013 following the Edward Snowden leaks, the U.S. continued to eavesdrop on Netanyahu and his aides, citing what U.S. President Obama reportedly called a "compelling national security purpose."

Ramallah Urges Peace Talks; Israel Says Not Until Attacks Stop

Israel is refusing to consider steps toward restarting stagnant peace talks with the Palestinians until the ongoing wave of violence comes to a close, Palestinian officials said Tuesday. There have been a number of high-level meetings between Israeli and Palestinian officials in recent weeks, during which Ramallah proposed restarting talks as an effort to stanch nearly three months of violence, which has seen near daily Palestinian terror attacks in Jerusalem and the West Bank, with more than 20 Israelis killed, and over a hundred Palestinians killed — most in the act of attacking Israelis, and others in clashes with Israeli troops.

Arab Likud MK Helped Crack Down on Israeli Arabs Joining ISIS

Likud MK Ayoob Kara, Deputy Minister of Regional Cooperation, used to double as an unofficial intermediary with the few of his fellow Arab citizens who have left to join the Islamic State in Syria or Iraq. Negotiating discreetly through relatives and go-betweens, he offered them reduced jail terms if they returned to Israel, cooperated with security services, and helped deter other would-be Islamic State recruits by publicly disavowing the group. A half-dozen volunteers took the deal, Kara says.

"After the holidays, we plan to meet with all EU ambassadors to discuss these issues," Joint List MK Yousef Jabareen (Hadash) said. Jabareen, who heads the Joint List international team, said that "this is part of our international advocacy endeavors, which are becoming one of the main advocacy tools of the Joint List…We believe that the human rights of our community are not just a local issue and that the international community has a role to play," he said.

Aliyah to Israel Increased in 2015

Over 30,000 people made Aliyah to Israel in 2015, the highest number in over a decade. Statistics published by the Ministry of Immigrant Absorption and the Jewish Agency on Tuesday showed an increase in Aliyah of around 10 percent from 2014 and the highest number of arrivals since the 2003 peak in immigration. The biggest proportion of Olim came from France, with around 7,900 French immigrants arriving in Israel in 2015. This is the second time that France has topped the list of countries of origin for Olim, a fact attributed in part to a string of terror attacks that have recently hit the country.

Palestinian Authority Rejects Possibility of Turkish Rule in Gaza

The Palestinian Authority on Tuesday rejected a report that Turkey might subjugate the Gaza Strip to its rule. Hamas has also denied the report, which was first published in the Turkish newspaper Hurriyet Daily News. The report claimed that Turkey wants free shipping access to the Gaza Strip in order to provide aid to the Palestinians as a condition for restoring normal ties with Israel. A government source in Ankara told the newspaper that Turkey would not back down from the demand, even at the cost of the collapse of rapprochement with Israel.

Netanyahu's Five-Pronged Strategy to Delay Two-State Solution

By Uri Savir

A two-state Israeli-Palestinian solution seems further away today than ever. Yet, the Israeli prime minister's office doesn't take this for granted and has developed a multipronged strategy as insurance.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu continues to place roadblocks in the path of any political process designed to bring about a two-state solution, according to a senior European Union official in Brussels who visits the region on a regular basis and spoke to Al-Monitor on condition of anonymity.

"There are two facets to Netanyahu's anti-two-state strategy," the official said. "Netanyahu attempts to ensure the non-viability of a Palestinian state, mainly through the expansion of settlements, and at the same time he recites a long list of reasons why Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas is sabotaging possible negotiations. In every meeting with Netanyahu, we discover another obstacle and hear another argument. In the corridors of the EU headquarters there are those defining Netanyahu as a 'serial alibi-ist,' always finding a reason not to place himself at the scene of a two-state solution negotiation."

At EU headquarters, there is a sense of hopelessness regarding Israeli-Palestinian conflict resolution, given Netanyahu's rejection of any initiative, Abbas' weakness and the US abstention from attempts to revive a peace process or to accept a UN Security Council resolution on the issue.

The EU source warns of a possible collapse of the Palestinian Authority and an outbreak of a violent intifada.

Netanyahu has a different analysis of the situation. A close confidant of the prime minister, talking to Al-Monitor on condition of anonymity, said Netanyahu is interested in a two-state solution with a demilitarized Palestinian state, conditioned on the recognition of the Jewish State of Israel and with stringent security measures throughout the West Bank.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet the source said, Netanyahu believes that now is the wrong time to move in that direction, when the entire region faces the threat of fundamentalist terror groups such as the Islamic State (IS), al-Qaeda, Hezbollah and Hamas. Terror, according to Netanyahu, must first be quelled — only then can political negotiations take place.

The Jerusalem source admitted the prime minister's office clearly has a plan to delay the two-state solution. The strategy consists of several elements.

First, the right-wing HaBayit HaYehudi (Jewish Home) party of Naftali Bennett needs to be kept within the coalition. Netanyahu has made this clear to Zionist Camp leader Isaac Herzog in back-channel talks on a possible national unity government. The prime minister considers Israeli settlers his main political base for his next election campaign. This constituency must be convinced that Netanyahu is their best guarantee against a Palestinian state, as he knows how to outmaneuver the international community.

Second, settlements need to be expanded, which would render establishing a Palestinian state impossible. This is especially true in the case of the Jerusalem-area settlements and those outside the settlement blocs that disrupt the contiguity of a future Palestinian state. Agriculture Minister Uri Ariel said in a Dec. 18 interview with the daily Israel Hayom that by 2019, the government plans to increase the number of settlers by 50% — to 600,000 — in the West Bank (not counting East Jerusalem).

Then there is the element of resisting US pressure. Netanyahu responded with a resounding "No" to US Secretary of State John Kerry during Kerry's last visit on Nov. 24 regarding any meaningful confidence-building measures, such as the release of Palestinian prisoners. Netanyahu excels in resisting US pressure and pointing the finger at Abbas. During the Kerry peace initiative of 2013-14, the prime minister agreed to certain concessions on a border based on 1967 lines, but conditioned them on Palestinians recognizing Israel as a Jewish state, something he knew the Americans would accept but Abbas would reject.

A fourth strategic component of Netanyahu's plan is cooperation with neighboring countries. Part of his well-orchestrated, anti-two-state strategy is to use Israel's close security cooperation with Egypt and Jordan to defuse their pressure on the Palestinian issue. The same is true for Israel potentially exporting natural gas to Turkey.

In addition, Netanyahu's office views IS as a major propaganda asset in making the case against a Palestinian state. The prime minister and his representatives equate random Palestinian terror attacks by individuals to IS terror, and warn that the West Bank risks turning into an IS base should Israel withdraw. This approach works well with most Israelis and with some in the international community who are mesmerized by the IS threat.

This strategy also shapes the content of Netanyahu's policy dialogue with both the United States and the EU.

This indicates that those who claim that Netanyahu has no foreign policy or does not achieve his strategic goals are wrong. The strategies, the diplomacy and the rhetoric all serve one central purpose: to prevent the establishment of a Palestinian state. Israel is shaping a new reality, from the Mediterranean Sea to the Jordan River — a binational apartheid state in the making.

Honored Judges

By Nahum Barnea

Eighteen months in prison are a very long time for a person who admits his guilt; they are an eternity for a person who is convinced he is not guilty. The sentence imposed yesterday by the Supreme Court judges on Ehud Olmert is very heavy. The prison time is only part of it. It is compounded by the knowledge that this spells an end to Olmert's hope to return to the public arena. A political career of about 50 years has ended. Beyond this, it is the understanding that this is it: The door has closed. There are no more appeals, no more requests, no more proceedings. For an optimistic person like Olmert, who was always certain of his ability to get out of any trouble, this is an unbearably harsh blow.

And he still faces the final decision in the Talansky case, and the threat of the State Attorney's Office to indict him in additional affairs. It is over, but not done with.

The ruling written by the five Supreme Court judges is an edifying document. Firstly, it is impressive in its clarity and transparency. It discusses the Holyland affair in a businesslike, measured, levelheaded manner. After reading it, I reread the ruling written by David Rozen, the Tel Aviv District Court judge. Rozen wrote a superficial, scathing, overly clever document. In terms of evidentiary law, it is an embarrassing document. Former minister Roni Baron gave me his own commentary last night on the Supreme Court judges' decision to overturn Olmert's conviction in the affair of the money sent by the wheeler-and-dealer Dechner to his brother Yossi. "The judges didn't acquit Olmert," he said. "They saved the justice system. Had they adopted Rozen's ruling, evidentiary law would have become meaningless."

Indeed, the ruling clearly shows an effort by the Supreme Court judges to restore the affair to its correct dimensions. It was not pity for the defendants (save one) that caused them to shift from conviction to partial acquittal, but rather an understanding of the written material. "There are judges in Jerusalem," Menahem Begin once said. It seems that there are not always judges in Tel Aviv.

The most dramatic change was in the sentence of Uri Lupoliansky, the former mayor of Jerusalem. Judge Rozen imposed a sentence of six years' imprisonment upon him; the Supreme Court only sentenced him to six months of community service. The Supreme Court judges took into account two mitigating facts: The fact that Lupoliansky did not take a penny into his own pocket—the money went directly to the Yad Sarah NPO that he founded; and the severe cancer from which he suffers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Lupoliansky is an amicable, positive person, and it is easy to identify with him. Judge Rozen was unduly cruel to him. However, Lupoliansky was the most senior public official who pushed to give benefits to the Holyland project. He was the leader of the bribe-takers. The Supreme Court reaffirmed his conviction for bribe-taking. Against this backdrop, the public celebration he organized for himself yesterday was discomfiting. His freedom was given to him, but the blemish remains. Incidentally, he has the wrong address: It is not the Holy One Blessed Be He who granted him his freedom, but rather human judges. They are the ones he should thank.

When one reads the ruling, including the various commentaries of the judges on the material they had before them, it seems that the judges underwent a process. On the one hand, they became convinced that the construction of the Holyland project was corrupt from the foundation; the people involved in such an affair must not get away without punishment. On the other hand, they had serious doubts about some of the evidence. The challenge was to resolve the certainty with the doubt.

Olmert's case is a good example. The judges acquitted him of the bribe-taking charge in the affair of the money sent by the criminal wheeler-and-dealer Dechner to Yossi, Olmert's escaped brother. The prosecution did not prove that Ehud knew about the money received by Yossi. This was enough for four judges to acquit.

The second charge pertained to NIS 60,000 that Shula Zaken asserted, in one of her versions, that she had transferred to cover Olmert's election debts. Here too there was grave doubt: Zaken deposited the money in her sister's bank account, withdrew it in cash, took a family vacation and then, as she argues, she gave it to Olmert. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court decided to convict.

Olmert was only a bench player in the Holyland affair. The decisions were not promoted by him; they were not made during his term of office. But Olmert is Olmert. In the backdrop of the trial were the Talansky cases, which were heard by other panels, and the Shula Zaken recordings. No one could remain indifferent to such embarrassing, severe materials, mainly when it is a prime minister in question. In the Supreme Court ruling the judges repeatedly mention Olmert's senior standing. They demand more of him. And when it comes to him, they also demand more of themselves.

When they decided to reduce his sentence they knew that they were facing a series of people, some with public status, who were driven mad by the thirst for Olmert's blood. Judge Amit replied well to this argument: "It may be that the public or part of it will be surprised or disappointed by Olmert's acquittal from the main charge," he wrote. "But the public's confidence in the court derives from the knowledge that it rules as required by the law and the evidence and not based on fear of the public's reaction… the court does not rule according to image, according to rumors or according to 'but everyone knows that…,' not for fear that the public will be disappointed and not according to interviews to the media. We do our best to isolate ourselves from external noise. This is what we have done and that is what we will do in the future."

The media attack, preach and sometimes fulminate, and the judges judge: That is how it should be. Indeed, there are judges in Jerusalem.

Dear Jake,
Thanks. It might be worthwhile to touch base on two issues with a short-term tail.

First is the deteriorating U.S.-Israel relationship, with the increasingly bitter Obama-Bibi tiff; his March 3 speech to Congress (both the improper process used, but also his likely message on more Iran sanctions); and the AIPAC conference where Bibi will speak the day before (and Hillary may also be speaking). Here a simple call from Hillary that it is important to stop the downward spiral of events with our close ally, notwithstanding mistakes, so we can focus on the key issues of Middle East peace and preventing Iran for acquiring a bomb would be a welcome positive, "adult" statement.

Second, we need to prepare for the likely announcement of a framework agreement toward the end of March between the U.S. and Iran. Hillary will have to make a statement. I would be glad to work with you on it. As I mentioned, I have chaired the Iran Task Force for the Atlantic Council for three years, and am in touch with the Administration.

Best wishes,

Stu

Dear Jake,

I hope you are well. I have talked with Melanne Verveer and Huma Abedin about helping in the potential presidential campaign. Most recently, I met with Tom Nides at the World Economic Forum in Davos to ask him the best way to plug-in to the policy side. He told me that you would be heading the policy and issues side of the campaign.

I have been privileged to work for all eight years of the Clinton Administration as U.S. Ambassador to the European Union; Under Secretary of Commerce for International Trade; Under Secretary of State for Economic, Business & Agricultural Issues; and as Deputy Secretary of the Treasury. During over six of those years, I also served as Special Adviser to the President and Secretary of State on Holocaust Issues, negotiating over $8 billion in recoveries in negotiations with the Swiss and French banks, German and Austrian corporations for slave and forced labor, European insurance companies for unpaid insurance policies, and with over 40 countries for the Washington Principles on Nazi-looted art, which has led to the restitution of thousands of stolen art works. In this work, I was strongly supported by both President Clinton and then-First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, who frequently asked to be briefed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

My relationship with her continued when she (as President Clinton had done) graciously agreed to speak to my Eizenstat Family Memorial Lecture series in Atlanta at the Ahavath Achim Synagogue, before over 2500 people. In her term as Secretary of State, she appointed me as her Special Adviser on Holocaust Issues, and in that capacity, I negotiated a $50 million agreement with Lithuania, and headed the U.S. delegation to the 2009 Prague Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets (which produced the Terezin Declaration) and the 2010 Prague Conference on Best Practices and Guidelines for the Restitution and Compensation of Real Property Confiscated by the Nazis and their allies from 1933-45.

My late wife Fran and Hillary worked at the Children's Defense Fund, and Hillary was especially kind to her over the years. When Fran passed away in 2013, she and President sent moving, handwritten notes of condolence, which I cherish to this day.

Because every word she utters is put into a campaign context, permit me to suggest areas in which I could be helpful, even now, before any formal campaign may be announced, and thereafter, if there is a formal announcement.

1. IRAN

As President Carter's Chief White House Domestic Policy Adviser, I helped shape the original hostage-related sanctions against Iran.

As Deputy Secretary of the Treasury in the Clinton Administration, I took the lead in imposing the first sanctions against Osama Ben Laden and al Qaeda. For the past three years I have chaired the Iran Task Force of the Atlantic Council (the first year as co-chair with Chuck Hagel, before he became Secretary of Defense) We have put out over a dozen published reports on all aspects of the Iranian situation, for the nuclear talks to their internal political and economic challenges, and have organized scores of conferences with leading experts. In this capacity, I have met with Iranian Foreign Minister Zarif in small, private meetings at their UN Mission in New York in 2013 and 2014, on the margins of the UN General Assembly and have reported the results to senior people in the Administration.

Our Task Force has been generally supportive of the Obama Administration's negotiations. Needless to say, if and when an agreement is reached on a nuclear deal, which I anticipate, this will become a political "hot potato". I can be helpful in shaping a response.

2. SANCTIONS AND GENERAL FOREIGN/DEFENSE POLICY

During the Clinton Administration, I was the "sanctions-meister", successfully negotiating sanctions issues with the European Union under the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act, the Helms-Burton Act, and the Religious Freedom Act. As I mentioned, I was involved in Iran sanctions issues from the Carter through the Clinton Administration, and now with the Atlantic Council.

But I have also become very knowledgeable in my private practice with the Ukraine-Russia related sanctions.

I am on the Defense Policy Board (appointed by Secretary of Defense Hagel), and we have focused on issues like Russia/Ukraine, ISIS, Iraq, and Syria.

3. INTERNATIONAL TRADE

I was involved as President Carter's Domestic Policy Adviser and Director of the White House Domestic Policy Staff, with the completion of the Tokyo Round of the WTO in 1977, led by Special Trade Represented Bob Strauss, and then the Uruguay Round in 1994, as U.S. Ambassador to the European Union, led by Special Trade Representative Mickey Kantor. I also served under Mickey as his Under Secretary of Commerce for International Trade, where I traveled around the world promoting American trade and investment, and then as Under Secretary of State, working on many of the same issues, but from a broader diplomatic perspective. I was involved in the China MFN issue.

As U.S. Ambassador to the European Union, I created, along with then Commerce Secretary Ron Brown, the Transatlantic Business Dialogue (TABD), which remains the officially recognized business voice on transatlantic trade issues by both the U.S. government and the European Union. To this day, I am the American chair of the Transatlantic Business Council (TABC), of which TABD is a part.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I chair the international trade and finance practice at Covington & Burling, LLP, and was selected recently as Trade Lawyer of the Year by the American Lawyer magazine. I have testified several times on international trade issues, particularly the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP). President Obama's Trade Representative Mike Froman and I meet frequently, most recently at the TABD/TABC meeting in Davos. He asked me to provide advice on the regulatory reform part of TTIP, along with a few other trade experts.

The Transpacific Partnership (TPP) will come before TTIP, as will Trade Promotion Authority (fast-track). All of these to one degree or the other will be opposed by labor and consumer groups. I believe I can help you shape positions on these.

4. EUROPEAN UNION

Having been U.S. Ambassador to the European Union (1993-96), negotiating with them frequently during the Clinton Administration, co-chairing the TABC, and writing articles on the EU (e.g. with our current U.S. Ambassador to the EU Tony Gardner in the 2010 Foreign Affairs Magazine), I believe I understand the EU as well as almost anyone. The EU is an increasingly important economic and political partner (e.g. Iran and Russian sanctions). I am well known in Brussels and can be helpful as an informal emissary there.

5. CLIMATE CHANGE

I was the head of the U.S. delegation, as Under Secretary of State, to the Kyoto Protocol negotiations, and played a central role in its negotiations, including aligning the positions of the EU, Japan, and other major industrial democracies with that of the U.S. I worked closely with then Vice President Gore and senior people in the White House, including Gene Sperling. I have continued to stay engaged in climate change issues. With the December 2015 Paris Climate Change Conference coming up, this issue will receive a great deal of visibility going into the 2016 election year.

6. ISRAEL, MIDDLE EAST PEACE PROCESS, JEWISH ISSUES

During the 2008 campaign, I served as a frequent surrogate speaker for the Hillary Clinton campaign on Israel and Jewish issues.

As Under Secretary of State and Deputy Secretary of the Treasury, I was responsible for dealing with the economic aspects of the peace process, while Dennis Ross led the political side. I negotiated some half dozen times with Yasir Arafat, worked on the QIZs in Gaza and Jordan (which I visited), the airport in Gaza, getting Palestinian workers and VIP Palestinian business leaders into Israel, and on other economic initiatives. Of course, this was done in close coordination with senior Israeli officials. As Under Secretary of State, I also negotiated with then Finance Minister Jacob Neeman, the phase-out of the economic assistance program for Israel, in return for increased levels of military assistance.

I also headed the U.S. government side of the joint U.S.-Israel Economic Dialogue during the Clinton Administration.

As a result of co-chairing with Dennis Ross, the Jewish People's Policy Institute of Jerusalem, a think tank created by the Jewish Agency and supported by major UJA Federation heads and major Jewish donors, Dennis and I meet for up to two hours annually with Prime Minister Netanyahu and his Cabinet to present our Assessment of the State of the Jewish People, for which Dennis and I do the Introduction. I have worked with the Prime Minister since his years as Finance Minister, and we have maintained a close relationship, despite our contrary views on settlements. I know most of the major figures in the Israeli political firmament. I travel to Israel two to three times a year, and have a vast array of friends and relatives there. Both my grandfather and great-grandfather are buried in the Petach Tikva cemetery.

For the past several decades, I participate in a small, off-the-record breakfast group, with the Israeli Ambassadors to the U.S., all of whom I know personally, most recently with Ron Dermer. Fran and I were so close to Ron and his family, that we went to his bar mitzvah in Miami, and remain a frequent guest at private events at his home. I have a close relationship with Howard Kohr of AIPAC, but at the same time, I am respected by the J Street group. Indeed, before he created J Street, Jeremy Ben-Ami came to seek my advice, and I urged then Ambassador Michael Oren to end the Israeli Embassy boycott of J Street, which they did, up to a point.

I could serve as a formal or informal emissary to Israeli government officials. I could also help with drafting and/or reviewing speeches on the Middle East peace process. I also know Palestinian officials. At Davos, for example, I participated in an off-the-record session "Breaking the Impasse" with the deputy prime minister and finance minister of the Palestinian Authority, and leading Palestinian and Israeli business people. I proposed to him the creation of QIZs in the West Bank, for example. Remarkably, while there was one in Gaza, that was very successful before the second intifada, and over a dozen in Jordan, there are none in the West Bank.

I have a great deal of visibility in the American and world Jewish community due to my ongoing Holocaust work; my co-chairmanship with Dennis of JPPI; two books ("Imperfect Justice; Looted Assets, Slave Labor and the Unfinished Business of World War II" on my Holocaust negotiations, in 2003 an later translated into four languages; and in 2012 and a new version in 2014, "The Future of the Jews: How Global Forces are Impacting on the Jewish People, Israel, and its Relationship with the United States"); frequent articles in Jewish publications, and speeches to Jewish audiences in the U.S. and around the world, from college campuses to federations to the General Assembly of the Jewish Agency to the upcoming AIPAC conference; my ongoing Holocaust negotiations; and my chairmanship of the Defiant Requiem Foundation, which has sponsored a concert-drama around the world (Kennedy Center, Lincoln Center, Jerusalem, Berlin, Prague, Budapest, etc.) called "Defiant Requiem: Verdi at Terezin", which honors a Jewish prisoner chorus at Theresenstadt concentration camp and the documentary "Defiant Requiem", which likewise honors the broader courageous artistic and musical performances at Theresenstadt. Our documentary was nominated for two Emmy awards in 2014 (best full-length documentary and best script), has been shown on PBS on Yom Hashoah day in 2013, and has been purchased by Netflix and BBC.

I continue to serve as Special Adviser on Holocaust Issues to Secretary of State Kerry, as I did for then-Secretary of State Clinton. On December 8, 2014, I signed in the State Department's Treaty Room a $60 million agreement with the French government for those current non-French citizens in the U.S., Israel, and around the world, who were involved in the deportations from France to the death camps, their spouses, and heirs. It was a widely-heralded breakthrough 70 years after the end of World War II. I am also working on the Gurlitt looted art case in Munich, and have met with the German Minister of Culture on this matter, with signficant results.

In my private capacity, since 2009, I have headed the negotiating team of the Jewish Claims Conference in their annual negotiations with the German Finance Ministry. Since 1952, the Claims Conference the official body for negotiations with the German government on behalf of Holocaust survivors. During that time, I have negotiated over $1.5 billion in benefits, including a landmark 2013 agreement for $1 billion in home care through 2017.

7. BUSINESS COMMUNITY

As a result of my corporate boards (UPS, BlackRock Funds, Alcatel-Lucent, Globe Specialty Metals), advisory boards (Christie's, GML Holdings, and formerly chair of the Coca-Cola International Advisory Board), co-chairmanship of the Transatlantic Business Council (with some sixty U.S. and European companies), and joint projects with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, I could help the campaign as a liaison/spokesman with the U.S. business community.

8. GENERAL POLITICAL AND POLICY ADVICE

I have been involved in senior capacities in presidential campaigns since the 1968 Hubert Humphrey campaign, for which I served as his research director, and the 1976 Jimmy Carter campaign, for which I was policy director. I have helped with policy issues in the Dukakis campaign, and Bill Clinton's campaign. I have a keen sense of the combination of policy and political factors.

Due to my work in the Carter and Johnson White Houses (my first job after Harvard Law School in 1967-68), and as Deputy Treasury Secretary, I am knowledgeable on a wide range of domestic issues, including job training (I recently co-authored an article on an apprenticeship program for the U.S., modeled on the German and Swiss models) health care, tax policy, as well as international economic policy.

I am sorry to have gone on so long, but wanted to give you the fullest menu from which you can feel free to enlist my assistance. I practice law full-time, and serve on four corporate boards, as well as chairing the Defiant Requiem Foundation and co-chairing JPPI and TABC. But, I am prepared to give you considerable

Best wishes,

Four Steps to Afghan Reconciliation

By Stephen J. Hadley and Andrew Wilder

August 12, 2015

The horrific bombings in Kabul this past week that killed and wounded hundreds of civilians are a grim reminder that there are enormous challenges ahead in Afghanistan. But a recent 10-day visit to the region convinced us that there is also still a real possibility of a path to peace.

Perhaps the most troubling thing we learned from senior Afghan and Pakistani officials during our visit was that Afghanistan is once again becoming a haven for transnational terrorist groups, including the brutal Islamic State. With much of the region in chaos, few U.S. allies have the political will, public support and ground forces to fight the terrorists. Afghanistan is a notable exception.

Last year's political and security transitions produced a reformist unity government led by President Ashraf Ghani and Chief Executive Abdullah Abdullah and the successful assumption of security responsibility by Afghan security forces. But the simultaneous withdrawal of more than 120,000 coalition troops and dramatic reduction in international military and civilian assistance produced a severe economic crisis. Pakistan's military operation in North Waziristan, coming right after the security transition in Afghanistan, pushed thousands of hardened militants across the border at a moment when Afghan forces were least able to handle them. Many fighters moved into northern Afghanistan, long a relatively quiet area.

The Afghans, still struggling with a long-standing Taliban-led insurgency, are now fighting militants drawn from throughout Central Asia, Pakistan, the Caucasus and the Middle East — something not envisioned in the planning for the security transition. Afghan forces are fighting bravely, mostly holding their own, but are taking heavy casualties.

Ghani's courageous outreach to Pakistan dramatically improved relations between the two countries, at least until the attacks of this weekend. This initiative came while Pakistan was still reeling from the devastating December attack by the Pakistani Taliban (the TTP) on the Army Public School in Peshawar that killed more than 130 children. This attack plus Ghani's outreach seem to have convinced Pakistan to support Afghan reconciliation and to sponsor direct discussions between Taliban and Afghan government representatives. The most recent meeting, on July 7 in Murree, Pakistan, with China and the United States observing, could become a full-fledged reconciliation process. We believe the internal Taliban power struggle and last weekend's attacks will delay things, perhaps for months, but have not killed the chance for talks.

Pakistan now seems to accept that it needs a stable Afghanistan that is not a terrorist safe haven. As one senior Afghan official told us: "The TTP changes things for Pakistan. The more the Pakistanis support the Haqqani Network and the Taliban to weaken the Afghan state, the more safe havens there will be in Afghanistan for the TTP to attack Pakistan."

But Pakistan clearly wants to control the reconciliation process and retain its influence over the Taliban. Afghans believe, with some justification, that Pakistan has doubled down on its material support to the Taliban during the current fighting season — both to hedge its bet on reconciliation and to strengthen its negotiating position. So, perversely, the prospects for peace and the pace of conflict have increased in tandem.

The Taliban appear to be under pressure. Pakistan seems to be pushing them toward reconciliation and the Afghan security forces have not collapsed, as some expected, following the coalition drawdown. The announcement of Taliban leader Mohammad Omar's death — two years after the fact — not only exacerbates growing internal divisions but also undermines the movement's legitimacy by raising questions about whether the group is simply an agent of Pakistan. And the arrival of the Islamic State introduces a potentially dangerous rival.

The Afghan government needs to take advantage of these developments by renewing its call for the Taliban to leave the insurgency and reconcile. The Pakistanis and Afghans to whom we talked all believe that the reconciliation process should be pursued despite considerable skepticism that it can succeed.

Success will depend largely on whether the Afghan unity government can dramatically improve its performance, communicate effectively to its people and provide some level of economic growth and better security and military effectiveness. But the United States and other friends of Afghanistan can take four steps to buy time for the Afghan government and to put pressure on the Taliban.

●First, increase U.S. and international diplomatic pressure on Pakistan to bring all Taliban elements to the table and make peace with Afghanistan.

●Second, provide short-term economic stimulus focused on job creation combined with governmental reforms. Even then, the improved public confidence the economy needs will depend as much if not more on improvements in governance and security.

●Continue the current level of financial support for the Afghan security forces, combined with an expanded U.S. mission to train, advise and assist those forces. These steps are needed to maintain both the morale of the Afghan forces and the military pressure that has helped bring the Taliban to the table.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

●Develop an Afghan counterterrorism platform in the country — supported by adequate U.S. intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance and close air support — to deny safe haven to terrorist groups in Afghanistan and the region and to encourage reconciliation.

We are not advocating a return to U.S. combat operations or a U.S. military buildup. But our suggestions will undoubtedly require a U.S. military presence closer to current levels than the 1,000-person Kabul-based force previously planned for post-2016. The exact size of the force should be mission-driven, with the theater commander having the flexibility to determine its composition, deployment and use.

We believe that, despite all the challenges, peace can come to Afghanistan. But both Afghanistan and the United States must do their part.

Crucial Weapons in the Defense of Ukraine

Without debt reduction and more aid, a young democracy could vanish

By Stephen J. Hadley and Robert B. Zoellick

July 20, 2015

Russia's aggression against Ukraine is an assault on the vision that emerged from the end of the Cold War of a Europe whole, free and at peace. For that vision to be realized, the war against Ukraine must end, and its government must be able to offer its people a secure, prosperous and democratic future. If Ukraine—a country of more than 40 million people—becomes a failed state, the turmoil will spill into the European Union and likely fuel future conflict between Russia and the trans-Atlantic community.

Since Russia invaded and "annexed" Crimea in March 2014, the war has destroyed an estimated 20% of Ukraine's economic potential and displaced about one million people. If Ukraine's economy collapses—and if its democracy descends into recriminations and clashing factions—there can be no successful defense of its territory and independence.

The International Monetary Fund forecasts that Ukraine's economy will shrink by 9% this year after a drop of about 7% in 2014, and that inflation will reach almost 50%. But the IMF has also been impressed by the Ukrainian government's efforts to reform an opaque system that for too long fueled corruption not growth. This required great courage at a time when ordinary Ukrainians are suffering from rising prices and plummeting living standards.

Earlier this year, the Ukrainian parliament adopted a comprehensive reform program. Pensions were cut and taxes increased. Energy prices almost quadrupled. The number of public officials was cut by 28,000. The budget process was transformed so spending discipline can be enforced. The IMF recognized these efforts with a $17.5 billion loan package this year. But the fund estimates that Ukraine will need about $40 billion over four years. Russia doesn't have to conquer Ukraine; it can bleed its economy until the society and government collapse.

The U.S., EU and World Bank have each committed about $2 billion. Other donors are assisting. But this is a pittance compared with Greece. All should stretch to do more. If the Ukrainian patriots fail for lack of support, Europeans and Americans will pay the price for years through costs of insecurity, criminal networks and social breakdown.

The IMF also expects Ukraine to restructure its debt to achieve about $15 billion of savings. This is critical: Of the $3 billion of IMF support that the Ukrainian government has received this year, $2.4 billion has been used to service debt. It will be hard to increase support if the emergency money flows out the door to creditors.

No creditor wants to yield to a debt restructuring. Yet the bondholders' commercial interest argues for a serious adjustment that enables Ukraine's reforms to succeed so that the creditors can eventually get paid. Put simply, the IMF numbers—and the reformers' budgets—do not add up without debt reduction. About $3 billion of Ukraine's euro bonds are held by Russia, and we are not aware of any principle that a debtor must repay a country that invades it.

The IMF has stated it will continue to support Ukraine, in accordance with the fund's lending-into-arrears policy, even if Kiev halts payments to creditors. The Ukrainian government has suggested that it is willing to offer creditors increased returns in the future if the recovery succeeds beyond the expectations of the IMF program—analogous to GDP warrants. Yet the Ukrainian Parliament has also authorized the government's negotiators to default if the creditors fail to agree to a package that gives Ukrainian democracy a chance to survive.

Ukraine is not Argentina. Nor is it Greece. The country has been invaded. A young democracy threatened by war is taking reform steps reminiscent of the courageous Poles 25 years ago. The Poles changed European history; Ukrainians can, too. The Ukrainian government has announced plans for police and judicial reforms, international audits, tax simplification, laws to protect investors, privatizations and land reforms. The odds may be long, but the prize is great, and the trans-Atlantic community will never have a better chance to invest in Ukraine's success.

If Western governments do not stretch to assist—and creditors persist with short-term calculations—the likelihood is high that Ukraine will fall back to the post-Soviet world of authoritarian government and gangster capitalism. An open and prosperous Ukraine will allow opportunity and commerce to flourish, not just within its own borders, but also within the wider region. The vital interests of Ukrainians, other Europeans, Americans and global investors are one and the same. Now is the moment for the U.S. to lead in pressing all the parties to recognize that truth.

The Oil-Export Ban Harms National Security

The U.S. is willfully denying itself a tool that could prove vital in dealing with threats from Russia, Iran and others.

By Stephen J. Hadley and Leon E. Panetta

The United States faces a startling array of global security threats, demanding national resolve and the resolve of our closest allies in Europe and Asia. Iran's moves to become a regional hegemon, Russia's aggression in Ukraine, and conflicts driven by Islamic terrorism throughout the Middle East and North Africa are a few of the challenges calling for steadfast commitment to American democratic principles and military readiness. The pathway to achieving U.S. goals also can be economic—as simple as ensuring that allies and friends have access to secure supplies of energy.

Blocking access to these supplies is the ban on exporting U.S. crude oil that was enacted, along with domestic price controls, after the 1973 Arab oil embargo. The price controls ended in 1981 but the export ban lives on, though America is awash in oil.

The U.S. has broken free of its dependence on energy from unstable sources. Only 27% of the petroleum consumed here last year was imported, the lowest level in 30 years. Nearly half of those imports came from Canada and Mexico. But our friends and allies, particularly in Europe, do not enjoy the same degree of independence. The moment has come for the U.S. to deploy its oil and gas in support of its security interests around the world.

Consider Iran. Multilateral sanctions, including a cap on its oil exports, brought Tehran to the negotiating table. Those sanctions would have proved hollow without the surge in domestic U.S. crude oil production that displaced imports. Much of that foreign oil in turn found a home in European countries, which then reduced their imports of Iranian oil to zero.

The prospect of a nuclear agreement with Iran does not permit the U.S. to stand still. Once world economic growth increases the demand for oil, Iran is poised to ramp up its exports rapidly to nations whose reduced Iranian imports were critical to the sanctions' success, including Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, Turkey, India and China. U.S. exports would help those countries diversify their sources and avoid returning to their former level of dependence on Iran.

More critically, if negotiations fail, or if Tehran fails to comply with its commitments, the sanctions should snap back into place, with an even tighter embargo on Iranian oil exports. It will be much harder to insist that other countries limit Iranian imports if the U.S. refuses to sell them its oil.

There are other threats arising from global oil suppliers that the U.S. cannot afford to ignore. Libya is racked by civil war and attacks by the Islamic State. Venezuela's mismanaged economy is near collapse.

Most ominous is Russia's energy stranglehold on Europe. Fourteen NATO countries buy 15% or more of their oil from Russia, with several countries in Eastern and Central Europe exceeding 50%. Russia is the sole or predominant source of natural gas for several European countries including Finland, Slovakia, Bulgaria and the Baltic states. Europe as a whole relies on Russia for more than a quarter of its natural gas.

This situation leaves Europe vulnerable to Kremlin coercion. In January 2009, Russia cut off natural gas to Ukraine, and several European countries completely lost their gas supply. A recent EU "stress test" showed that a prolonged Russian supply disruption would result in several countries losing 60% of their gas supplies.

Further, revenue from sales to Europe provides Russia with considerable financial resources to fund its aggression in Ukraine. That conflict could conceivably spread through Central Europe toward the Baltic states. So far, the trans-Atlantic alliance has held firm, but the trajectory of this conflict is unpredictable. The U.S. can provide friends and allies with a stable alternative to threats of supply disruption. This is a strategic imperative as well as a matter of economic self-interest.

The domestic shale energy boom has supported an estimated 2.1 million U.S. jobs, according to a 2013 IHS study, but the recent downturn in oil prices has led to massive cuts in capital spending for exploration and production. Layoffs in the oil patch have spread outward, notably to the steel industry. Lifting the export ban would put some of these workers back on the job and boost the U.S. economy.

Why, then, does the ban endure? Habit and myth have something to do with it. U.S. energy policy remains rooted in the scarcity mentality that took hold in the 1970s. Even now, public perception has yet to catch up to the reality that America has surpassed both Russia and Saudi Arabia as the world's largest producer of liquid petroleum (exceeding 11 million barrels a day). The U.S. became the largest natural gas producer in 2010, and the federal government will now license exports of liquefied natural gas.

The fear that exporting U.S. oil would cause domestic gasoline prices to rise is misplaced. The U.S. already exports refined petroleum, including 875,000 barrels a day of gasoline in December 2014. The result is that U.S. gasoline prices approximate the world price. Several recent studies, including by the Brookings Institution, Resources for the Futureand Rice University's Center for Energy Studies, demonstrate that crude oil exports would actually put downward pressure on U.S. gasoline prices, as more oil supply hits the global market and lowers global prices.

Too often foreign-policy debates in America focus on issues such as how much military power should be deployed to the Middle East, whether the U.S. should provide arms to the Ukrainians, or what tougher economic sanctions should be imposed on Iran. Ignored is a powerful, nonlethal tool: America's abundance of oil and natural gas. The U.S. remains the great arsenal of democracy. It should also be the great arsenal of energy.

Highlight #1
McCain's Campaign Failing Him, Having Trouble Finding Consistent Message (MSNBC 07/11/08 6:48pm)
DAVID GREGORY: Where has McCain's campaign failed him? . . . you've got a candidate and a campaign and as one Republican told me this week, a campaign is like running a company and your product is politics and you're serving one master in terms of the candidate. Has the campaign let him down?

NOAH OPPENHEIMER: The campaign's absolutely let him down. I don't think there's really any question about that . . . John McCain is John McCain. He will never be the electrifying presence that Barack Obama is and I think that the problem that this campaign has had is that they've spent these last couple months almost fighting who he naturally is instead of trying to find, to pander, to get the base going . . . John McCain is not a guy who's going to excite James Dobson, it's just not going to happen. But John McCain does have a message that could resonate . . . with the things that people are caring about right now which is that the institutions in this country are failing the average American and they need to be fixed . . .

GREGORY: Does the McCain campaign have to emulate Bush of '04? Does it have to be run like a fortune five hundred company when that's not who he is?

JOHN HARWOOD: Any campaign has to have message discipline in order to succeed. The problem is that John McCain's message is not entirely coherent because of who he is. Yes he is a maverick. Yes he's also a conservative Republican. He makes it difficult for his campaign as well and lets face it, the John McCain that Noah's talking about, the maverick reformer is not particularly popular within the Republican party and he needs an enthusiastic Republican Party if he's going to win this election.

McCain's Comments on Social Security an Example of His Change Since 2000 (MSNBC 07/11/08 5:06pm)
MIKE BARNICLE: . . . he is approaching one of the third-rails of American politics, Social Security and he doesn't have too many specifics there other than saying it's a disgrace. Again this fits in with the portrait that's being painted of the McCain campaign of a campaign that can't stay on message . . .

DAVID CORN: I think it's worse. When he said that he was essentially challenging the fundamental funding mechanism of Social Security . . . by saying that that's a disgrace, he's saying that the whole program should be shot and buried . . . maybe it was a slip-up, maybe he didn't understand what he was saying but it goes back to a point that I think Jonathan and I agree on, that when it comes to these sort of issues he doesn't appear to have really embraced them and thought about them much in a way the resonates with people except for one issue, and that is free trade, which certainly doesn't help him in states like Ohio, Michigan and Pennsylvania . . .

BARNICLE: . . . this is a quote from The New York Times, "afterward, spokesmen for the McCain campaign said that his use of 'disgrace' was meant to refer not to Social Security itself but to Washington's unwillingness to address distortions developing in the system. But Mr. McCain seemed to undermine his staff's explanation when he appeared on CNN Tuesday and, to a large extent, repeated himself. 'They pay their taxes and right now their taxes are going to pay the retirement of present day retirees."

He said by way of explaining his support for allowing young workers to open private accounts for retirement." We're not even on the highway with the McCain campaign, Jonathan, we're still in the middle of the summer and yet the wheels seem to be sort of coming off. He's taking all of these exit ramps with the Straight-Talk Express into these adjunct issues when he should be staying on message. When's he going to get on message? Can he stay on message?

JONATHAN ALTER: First of all, on Social Security, this is a much bigger problem for him than a misstatement . . . the real problem for John McCain on Social Security, Mike, is that he backed President Bush's privatization plan. That plan was so unpopular in 2005 that it never even came up for a vote . . . this is a dead sure loser in American politics. McCain was for it . . .

CORN: . . . I mad a list before coming on this show of about a dozen missteps and slip ups he had, not just about what we talked about . . . his campaign and he himself to a certain extent appear a little discombobulated this week after a staff shake up was supposed to make everything sail smoothly. So he's still has yet to show that he can campaign effectively, passionately . . .

BARNICLE: . . . is what happened this week, if you take Phil Gramm out of it, is this John McCain being John McCain? I mean, everybody says let McCain be McCain. Is this McCain being McCain?

CORN: I don't think so in some ways. The John McCain that a lot of reporters knew and loved in 2000 as a straight-talker, now under the, as part of this gigantic presidential campaign, managed a lot by professional party hacks and operatives, is flip-flopping and not straight-talking the way that he claims he used to and I think he's not putting his best foot forward and he's not showing himself as an independent maverick, free of political spin that he tried to at least do back in 2000. He's made too many bargains with the devil to get the nomination and it's going to be hard for him to campaign like the old John McCain when he's the new baggage ridden John McCain.

Gramm's Comments and McCain's Reaction Reveal McCain's Lack of Interest In, Knowledge Of the Economy (MSNBC 07/11/08 5:01pm)
MIKE BARNICLE: The straight talk express derailed . . .

[plays Phil Gramm footage]

BARNICLE: All right, I don't want to whine about this too much but, uh, it seems to me that the McCain campaign had perhaps its second or third reorganization recently. Steve Schmidt, a very terrific professional, brought in to streamline the message, get people on track and now we've had this. When John McCain was supposed to be out talking about the economy this week, going to Michigan, talking about real things that concern real working people in this country, you've got Phil Gramm saying this today. Jonathan, what does this say about the McCain campaign?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JONATHAN ALTER: Well they've got a big problem here Mike because Phil Gramm is not just any old surrogate off mouthing off . . . he's John McCain's principle economic advisor. They've been very, very close for 25 years. And actually John McCain supported Phil Gramm for President of the United States in 1996. He's listened to him a lot on this issue, which by McCain's own admission, he doesn't really know anything about. So the question is, how much of a window is this into McCain's real thinking about where we are economically? . . . here Gramm conveyed what a lot of people in the McCain camp think is the truth about the economy.

BARNICLE: David, lets talk about the window that David mentioned, I mean there's about 115, 116 days left until election day. Washington Post story . . . yesterday John McCain was in Michigan, the post story indicates that he tried to speak about the economy, to automobile workers, people in Michigan, didn't go over to well . . . basically sat on their hands . . . how much of a window does John McCain have . . . to sort of touch people about his concerns about the economy . . . ?

DAVID CORN: We're getting pretty close to the time being past . . . he's never come across as a guy who's populist or who really seems to care a lot about working on economic issues. And then you have Phil Gramm come out and make this comment and then John McCain says he doesn't speak for me. Well, about at the same time that John McCain said that yesterday Phil Gramm was appearing at the Wall Street Journal editorial board. What was he doing there? Speaking for John McCain. This reaffirms . . . the suspicion that a lot of people have, that John McCain, this isn't what he cares most about. He can't talk about it persuasively and this is the guy advising

ALTER: I think David put his finger on a really important point about this campaign. There's what you could call a passion gap for John McCain between the passion that he feels about international relations . . . he's very knowledgeable and very passionate when it comes to talking about the world but when it comes to discussing domestic outside of pork barrel spending and campaign finance reform he's very unenthusiastic, just not passionate, doesn't seem to care a real lot or be real interested and the problem with McCain is that he's a genuine enough guy that he's not a good faker. He can't really fake being passionate about the economy because he's not.

'McCain Relaunch Misfires' (CNN 07/11/08 4:32pm)
DANA BASH: […] as one republican strategist that I talked to put it to me, he said, 'McCain is still ending the week, scarred with some self-inflicted wounds.' […]

JOHN MCCAIN: I have a proven record. I have a proven record of reaching across the aisle. […] I'll do everything in my power to get those oil offshore reserves exploited—eh, explored, discovered and—explored AND exploited.

BASH: A Freudian slip, of sorts from the self-described environmentalist now calling for drilling offshore; evidence that McCain's week of events to re-launch his campaign had some misfires. Case in point:

PHIL GRAMM: We sort of have become a nation of whiners.

BASH: Having to rebuke his good friend and economic adviser for declaring the country is in a mental recession. […] Some awkward moments got less national attention, but maybe just as politically perilous, like going to the battleground of Michigan where many voters believe free trade sent their jobs overseas and saying this:

MCCAIN: I believe free trade is important.

BASH: Too much straight talk for these voters who told him so. […] Some republicans tell CNN they worry McCain's free trade message is alienating blue-collar voters he's trying to pull from Barack Obama. Experts agree.

BERNIE PORN: He may think that he's telling the truth about the issue, but this is one of those issues where I can assure him that voters can't handle that truth.

McCain's Bad Week as a List (MSNBC 07/11/08 8:05pm)
RACHAEL MADDOW: If John McCain were anybody but John McCain, then the week he had might well be remembered as one of the worst weeks ever for a presidential nominee. Let's break it down, shall we? First there was the Steeler/Packer POW-gate. He's only running for president people, how can he be expected to remember crucial details about his own life? Also, his top economic advisor calls Americans a bunch of whiners for complaining about an economy that's only in a "mental recession," which he likened to mental depression and the guy gets to keep his national co-chair position with the campaign . . . also, one of McCain's other economic advisors tells women voters that McCain is just as upset as she is that insurance companies pay for Viagra but refuse to cover birth control leaving McCain to squirm and stammer and attempt to leave his own body during a Q&A session on his campaign bus. OK, at least that tape was kind of enjoyable. On Monday, McCain described Social Security as a total disgrace, not saying it merely needed to be fixed but, quote, "We are paying present day retirees with the taxes paid by young workers in America today."

In other words, he called the entire premise of Social Security disgraceful. McCain made a joke about killing Iranians civilians by giving them lung cancer. McCain conveniently ignored it when Iraqi officials, including the prime minister called for the withdrawal of US troops from Iraq, even though he'd said before that if the Iraqis wanted us to leave, we'd leave. And if all that were not enough, he claimed to have a record with veterans' associations that he really doesn't have.

He attacked Barack Obama for not voting on something he didn't vote on either, the Kyle-Lieberman Amendment. And he promised to balance the budget by the end of his first term with all the money he will have saved by winning the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Highlight #2
McCain Appears to Have Been Married to Cindy and Carol Simultaneously (CBS 07/08/08 4:34pm)
DEBORAH NORVILLE: An article in the Los Angeles Times is raising some serious questions for John McCain and they revolve around his marriage to his second wife, Cindy.

PAUL BOYD: Was John McCain still married to his first wife when he applied for a marriage license with his second wife, Cindy? That's the question facing McCain after a front page article in Friday's Los Angeles Times. According to the newspaper, McCain's account of the timing of his divorce from first wife, Carol, and marriage to Cindy, quote, "conflict with the public record." John and Cindy McCain met at a party in 1979. In his memoir, Worth the Fighting For, he began spending time with her while separated from his first wife Carol.

He wrote his divorce become final in February of 1980, more than three months before his marriage to Cindy. But according to The Los Angeles Times, court records show McCain's divorce from Carol wasn't actually granted until April 2nd, 1980. So what's the controversy? The Los Angeles Times is reporting that McCain obtained an Arizona marriage license on March 6th, 1980 to marry Cindy. Which means he got it while still legally married to his first wife.

FLAVIA COLGAN: It could create some strain with the conservative base, which he already has problems with, because any deviation of standard family values is a problem for them.

BOYD: McCain's messy divorce from Carol apparently fractured his relationship with Ronald and Nancy Reagan. Carol McCain, who's now 70 and living in Virginia was a close friend of the Reagans' and they were upset when he left her for Cindy.

NANCY REAGAN: Well, obviously, this is the nominee of the party.

BOYD: The paper points to Nancy Reagan's less than exuberant endorsement of McCain last March as a sign that the relationship may still be rocky.

Highlight #3
Situation Room Fact Checks McCain's Contradictory Energy Plans (CNN 07/11/08 5:41pm)
JOHN MCCAIN: […] when you cut through all the smooth rhetoric, Senator Obama's policies would make it harder for women to start new businesses, harder for women to find or create new jobs, harder for women to manage the family budget, and harder for women and their families to meet their tax burden.

FRANK SESNO: [McCain] wants more offshore drilling. He used to oppose it. Now he says we need it. […] McCain's a big booster of nuclear power. […] but, as for the waste, more trouble there too. He favors putting it in Nevada's Yucca Mountain; says it would be safe there, but, in a speech in Denver in May, he suggested international storage that could make Yucca unnecessary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Las Vegas Sun criticized McCain's about-face on Yucca and suggested he was just pandering to Nevada voters. The McCain campaign says the international storage idea was nearly aspirational.

McCain favors ethanol. Though he once opposed it, it's the subsidies he doesn't like now and he says technologies like solar and wind can get off the ground if they just have stable long-term tax credits. He's proposed a $300 million prize for a more efficient electric car battery.

McCain wants the marketplace, not government to pick the new energy winners. Yet McCain would help provide $2 billion a year to help develop clean coal. He'd continue government guarantees to help build expensive nuclear power plants and his proposed corporate tax cuts would help big oil's bottom line by nearly $4 billion a year, according to the liberal Center for American Progress.

McCain's Responds to Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac (MSNBC 07/11/08 6:03pm)
DAVID GREGORY: The question is, will taxpayers be called on to help keep these companies afloat? Sen. McCain said today the government may indeed have to act.

JOHN MCCAIN: There's no doubt that there's a real significant, far-reaching problem that is going to have to very likely require some kind of government assistance. Whether its helping in raising capital or whether its, what that course of action is, we need to examine very carefully, listening to smart people, rapidly, perhaps congressional hearings if necessary but there's no doubt that we can't have these two institutions go under.

Subject: [big campaign] Obama Speech

On the economy

"John McCain has spent a lot of time talking about trips to Iraq in the last few weeks, but maybe if he spent some time taking trips to the cities and towns that have been hardest hit by this economy – cities in Michigan, and Ohio, and right here in Minnesota – he'd understand the kind of change that people are looking for."

On the GOP and fearmongering

"The other side will come here in September and offer a very different set of policies and positions, and that is a debate I look forward to. It is a debate the American people deserve. But what you don't deserve is another election that's governed by fear, and innuendo, and division. What you won't hear from this campaign or this party is the kind of politics that uses religion as a wedge, and patriotism as a bludgeon – that sees our opponents not as competitors to challenge, but enemies to demonize. Because we may call ourselves Democrats and Republicans, but we are Americans first. We are always Americans first."

On change

"Change is realizing that meeting today's threats requires not just our firepower, but the power of our diplomacy – tough, direct diplomacy where the President of the United States isn't afraid to let any petty dictator know where America stands and what we stand for. We must once again have the courage and conviction to lead the free world. That is the legacy of Roosevelt, and Truman, and Kennedy. That's what the American people want. That's what change is."

After the jump, his tribute to Hillary Clinton and more.

Tonight, after fifty-four hard-fought contests, our primary season has finally come to an end.

Sixteen months have passed since we first stood together on the steps of the Old State Capitol in Springfield, Illinois. Thousands of miles have been traveled. Millions of voices have been heard. And because of what you said – because you decided that change must come to Washington; because you believed that this year must be different than all the rest; because you chose to listen not to your doubts or your fears but to your greatest hopes and highest aspirations, tonight we mark the end of one historic journey with the beginning of another – a journey that will bring a new and better day to America. Tonight, I can stand before you and say that I will be the Democratic nominee for President of the United States.

I want to thank every American who stood with us over the course of this campaign – through the good days and the bad; from the snows of Cedar Rapids to the sunshine of Sioux Falls. And tonight I also want to thank the men and woman who took this journey with me as fellow candidates for President.

At this defining moment for our nation, we should be proud that our party put forth one of the most talented, qualified field of individuals ever to run for this office. I have not just competed with them as rivals, I have learned from them as friends, as public servants, and as patriots who love America and are willing to work tirelessly to make this country better. They are leaders of this party, and leaders that America will turn to for years to come.

That is particularly true for the candidate who has traveled further on this journey than anyone else. Senator Hillary Clinton has made history in this campaign not just because she's a woman who has done what no woman has done before, but because she's a leader who inspires millions of Americans with her strength, her courage, and her commitment to the causes that brought us here tonight.

We've certainly had our differences over the last sixteen months. But as someone who's shared a stage with her many times, I can tell you that what gets Hillary Clinton up in the morning – even in the face of tough odds – is exactly what sent her and Bill Clinton to sign up for their first campaign in Texas all those years ago; what sent her to work at the Children's Defense Fund and made her fight for health care as First Lady; what led her to the United States Senate and fueled her barrier-breaking campaign for the presidency – an unyielding desire to improve the lives of ordinary Americans, no matter how difficult the fight may be. And you can rest assured that when we finally win the battle for universal health care in this country, she will be central to that victory. When we transform our energy policy and lift our children out of poverty, it will be because she worked to help make it happen. Our party and our country are better off because of her, and I am a better candidate for having had the honor to compete with Hillary Rodham Clinton.

There are those who say that this primary has somehow left us weaker and more divided. Well I say that because of this primary, there are millions of Americans who have cast their ballot for the very first time. There are Independents and Republicans who understand that this election isn't just about the party in charge of Washington, it's about the need to change Washington. There are young people, and African-Americans, and Latinos, and women of all ages who have voted in numbers that have broken records and inspired a nation.

All of you chose to support a candidate you believe in deeply. But at the end of the day, we aren't the reason you came out and waited in lines that stretched block after block to make your voice heard. You didn't do that because of me or Senator Clinton or anyone else. You did it because you know in your hearts that at this moment – a moment that will define a generation – we cannot afford to keep doing what we've been doing. We owe our children a better future. We owe our country a better future. And for all those who dream of that future tonight, I say – let us begin the work together. Let us unite in common effort to chart a new course for America.

In just a few short months, the Republican Party will arrive in St. Paul with a very different agenda. They will come here to nominate John McCain, a man who has served this country heroically. I honor that service, and I respect his many accomplishments, even if he chooses to deny mine. My differences with him are not personal; they are with the policies he has proposed in this campaign.

Because while John McCain can legitimately tout moments of independence from his party in the past, such independence has not been the hallmark of his presidential campaign.

It's not change when John McCain decided to stand with George Bush ninety-five percent of the time, as he did in the Senate last year.

It's not change when he offers four more years of Bush economic policies that have failed to create well-paying jobs, or insure our workers, or help Americans afford the skyrocketing cost of college – policies that have lowered the real incomes of the average American family, widened the gap between Wall Street and Main Street, and left our children with a mountain of debt.

And it's not change when he promises to continue a policy in Iraq that asks everything of our brave men and women in uniform and nothing of Iraqi politicians – a policy where all we look for are reasons to stay in Iraq, while we spend billions of dollars a month on a war that isn't making the American people any safer.

So I'll say this – there are many words to describe John McCain's attempt to pass off his embrace of George Bush's policies as bipartisan and new. But change is not one of them.

Change is a foreign policy that doesn't begin and end with a war that should've never been authorized and never been waged. I won't stand here and pretend that there are many good options left in Iraq, but what's not an option is leaving our troops in that country for the next hundred years – especially at a time when our military is overstretched, our nation is isolated, and nearly every other threat to America is being ignored.

We must be as careful getting out of Iraq as we were careless getting in - but start leaving we must. It's time for Iraqis to take responsibility for their future. It's time to rebuild our military and give our veterans the care they need and the benefits they deserve when they come home. It's time to refocus our efforts on al Qaeda's leadership and Afghanistan, and rally the world against the common threats of the 21st century – terrorism and nuclear weapons; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. That's what change is.

Change is realizing that meeting today's threats requires not just our firepower, but the power of our diplomacy – tough, direct diplomacy where the President of the United States isn't afraid to let any petty dictator know where America stands and what we stand for. We must once again have the courage and conviction to lead the free world. That is the legacy of Roosevelt, and Truman, and Kennedy. That's what the American people want. That's what change is.

Change is building an economy that rewards not just wealth, but the work and workers who created it. It's understanding that the struggles facing working families can't be solved by spending billions of dollars on more tax breaks for big corporations and wealthy CEOs, but by giving a the middle-class a tax break, and investing in our crumbling infrastructure, and transforming how we use energy, and improving our schools, and renewing our commitment to science and innovation. It's understanding that fiscal responsibility and shared prosperity can go hand-in-hand, as they did when Bill Clinton was President.

John McCain has spent a lot of time talking about trips to Iraq in the last few weeks, but maybe if he spent some time taking trips to the cities and towns that have been hardest hit by this economy – cities in Michigan, and Ohio, and right here in Minnesota – he'd understand the kind of change that people are looking for.

Maybe if he went to Iowa and met the student who works the night shift after a full day of class and still can't pay the medical bills for a sister who's ill, he'd understand that she can't afford four more years of a health care plan that only takes care of the healthy and wealthy. She needs us to pass health care plan that guarantees insurance to every American who wants it and brings down premiums for every family who needs it. That's the change we need.

Maybe if he went to Pennsylvania and met the man who lost his job but can't even afford the gas to drive around and look for a new one, he'd understand that we can't afford four more years of our addiction to oil from dictators. That man needs us to pass an energy policy that works with automakers to raise fuel standards, and makes corporations pay for their pollution, and oil companies invest their record profits in a clean energy future – an energy policy that will create millions of new jobs that pay well and can't be outsourced. That's the change we need.

And maybe if he spent some time in the schools of South Carolina or St. Paul or where he spoke tonight in New Orleans, he'd understand that we can't afford to leave the money behind for No Child Left Behind; that we owe it to our children to invest in early childhood education; to recruit an army of new teachers and give them better pay and more support; to finally decide that in this global economy, the chance to get a college education should not be a privilege for the wealthy few, but the birthright of every American. That's the change we need in America. That's why I'm running for President.

The other side will come here in September and offer a very different set of policies and positions, and that is a debate I look forward to. It is a debate the American people deserve. But what you don't deserve is another election that's governed by fear, and innuendo, and division. What you won't hear from this campaign or this party is the kind of politics that uses religion as a wedge, and patriotism as a bludgeon – that sees our opponents not as competitors to challenge, but enemies to demonize. Because we may call ourselves Democrats and Republicans, but we are Americans first. We are always Americans first.

Despite what the good Senator from Arizona said tonight, I have seen people of differing views and opinions find common cause many times during my two decades in public life, and I have brought many together myself. I've walked arm-in-arm with community leaders on the South Side of Chicago and watched tensions fade as black, white, and Latino fought together for good jobs and good schools. I've sat across the table from law enforcement and civil rights advocates to reform a criminal justice system that sent thirteen innocent people to death row. And I've worked with friends in the other party to provide more children with health insurance and more working families with a tax break; to curb the spread of nuclear weapons and ensure that the American people know where their tax dollars are being spent; and to reduce the influence of lobbyists who have all too often set the agenda in Washington.

In our country, I have found that this cooperation happens not because we agree on everything, but because behind all the labels and false divisions and categories that define us; beyond all the petty bickering and point-scoring in Washington, Americans are a decent, generous, compassionate people, united by common challenges and common hopes. And every so often, there are moments which call on that fundamental goodness to make this country great again.

So it was for that band of patriots who declared in a Philadelphia hall the formation of a more perfect union; and for all those who gave on the fields of Gettysburg and Antietam their last full measure of devotion to save that same union.

So it was for the Greatest Generation that conquered fear itself, and liberated a continent from tyranny, and made this country home to untold opportunity and prosperity.

So it was for the workers who stood out on the picket lines; the women who shattered glass ceilings; the children who braved a Selma bridge for freedom's cause.

So it has been for every generation that faced down the greatest challenges and the most improbable odds to leave their children a world that's better, and kinder, and more just.

And so it must be for us.

America, this is our moment. This is our time. Our time to turn the page on the policies of the past. Our time to bring new energy and new ideas to the challenges we face. Our time to offer a new direction for the country we love.

The journey will be difficult. The road will be long. I face this challenge with profound humility, and knowledge of my own limitations. But I also face it with limitless faith in the capacity of the American people. Because if we are willing to work for it, and fight for it, and believe in it, then I am absolutely certain that generations from now, we will be able to look back and tell our children that this was the moment when we began to provide care for the sick and good jobs to the jobless; this was the moment when the rise of the oceans began to slow and our planet began to heal; this was the moment when we ended a war and secured our nation and restored our image as the last, best hope on Earth. This was the moment – this was the time – when we came together to remake this great nation so that it may always reflect our very best selves, and our highest ideals. Thank you, God Bless you, and may God Bless the United States of America.

Subject: Nine Reasons to Support the Iran Deal

Colleagues & Friends,

Having carefully reviewed the lengthy and complex agreement negotiated by the United States and our international partners with Iran, I have reached the following conclusion: If I were a member of Congress, I would vote yes on the deal.

In a piece published today in The Atlantic, I outline nine reasons why, including that this agreement achieves America's minimum essential objectives, and that, at this point, a "better deal" is an illusion.

Ultimately, neither this deal nor any feasible alternative "solves" the Iranian problem, and the Islamic Republic's nuclear ambitions will remain a cardinal national security challenge. This agreement, however, puts us in the best position to meet this challenge.

As always, I welcome your feedback. And I recommend regularly visiting Iran Matters, the Belfer Center's hub for Iran news and analysis, for the latest take from our experts and others that we believe are adding value.

Subject: RE: Shaping an upcoming DCorps McCain survey 4pm

All,

Stan, Susan, Tara and the former PM team and I had a brief call today to discuss the McCain survey that we aim to field early next week. Here is a quick summary of what we discussed. If any of you have thoughts or suggestions on what to include in this survey please feel free to send them along. If people think it is worthwhile we could also set up a follow-up call later in the week.

The Battleground:

We discussed adding Minnesota and North Carolina to the battleground and decided to include Minnesota but not North Carolina. That leaves our battleground as follows:

- Minnesota
- Iowa
- Wisconsin
- Pennsylvania
- Colorado
- New Mexico
- Michigan
- Ohio
- New Hampshire
- Virginia
- Nevada
- Missouri
- Nebraska's 1st Congressional District

Content

We decided to draft hits on the following topics. We won't be able to include all of them in the survey, but these are hits we want to consider:

- Energy
  - Offshore drilling (flip-flop angle, Bush/oil company angle/environmental angle)
  - Support for nuclear powr
  - Comprehensive hit on support for oil companies – updated lobbyist ties, drilling, gas tax, support for tax breaks
- Taxes (based on recent back and forth – tax cuts for the wealthy and not the middle class etc)
- Women and Abortion
  - Pure abortion and judges hit
  - Comprehensive women's issues hit
- Health care (with focus on McCain plan causing people who get coverage from employers to lose it)
- Security
  - Revise our draft attack from last time to test endless war/warmonger with and without the draft in it
  - An Iraq is making us less secure hit
  - An opposition to diplomacy hit
- Economy
  - Revise our middle class populism hits
  - A revised economic fundamentals hit

We'll also be looking at a bunch of recent surveys, public and private, to inform our choice of hits to test.

Please let us know if you have additions to this list.

Subject: Shaping an upcoming DCorp McCain survey

All,

Democracy Corp will be fielding a McCain survey beginning next Monday. Stan would set up a call to talk about the contents of the survey. Are any of you available to connect tomorrow afternoon around 4pm? Please let me know if this time works. It would be great to have your input. I will send out the call in number once the time is finalized by the majority. Thanks

Best regards,
Darryl

Subject: RE: Call with HRC

It's a joke that would work and room would love it. However one caveat:

I think it gives Bernie the credit for putting the email crap behind us instead of her --- she crushed the debate and she crushed at the committee.. And while crowd may love it question for comms team is whether reporters would take it as proof that Bernie "saved" her campaign from the email tempest.

Maybe I'm being too literal here but that was my thought process.

If others think I'm overthinking this, we can use it.

Line could be ---- I don't if you all saw it but the hearing went on for 11 hours. Eleven hours. I was kind of expecting around hour # 8 Bernie Sanders would burst in and shout --- "enough about your damn emails Hillary!!"

Here's Obama in 2007:

Barack Obama, 2007

Thank you so much. To the great Governor of Iowa and Lieutenant. Governor of Iowa. To my dear friend Tom Harkin for the outstanding work that he does. To the congressional delegation of Iowa that is doing outstanding work and to Nancy Pelosi , Madam Speaker, thank you all for the wonderful welcome and the wonderful hospitality.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

Dear John

Read your White House email. Seems a long long time before China reaches its peak.

If there was an alternative that was not costly to implement, zero rated (completely) and probably up and running within 12 months, would anybody be interested or is it just business as usual.

Nuclear will be the fuel of the future but until then, and the safety elements are put to rest, this may well be a 10 year stop-gap.

Best wishes

Poll: United Centrist Party w/ General Ashkenazi Could Oust Bibi

A centrist party that includes former chief of General Staff Gabi Ashkenazi, Yesh Atid chairman Yair Lapid, and Kulanu chairman Moshe Kahlon would get 29 Knesset seats in a general election, compared to only 24 for Likud, according to a poll released Thursday night by Channel 10 news. According to a poll by Channel 2, the public believes that Ashkenazi had a better chance of defeating Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in an election than Zionist Union chairman Isaac Herzog or Lapid, but still find Netanyahu more suitable to be prime minister.

Abbas: I Attempted to Meet Netanyahu, but He Never Responded

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas on Thursday told Israeli reporters that he tried to arrange a meeting with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, but did not get a response. "There were contacts for a meeting with Netanyahu two months ago, but his people evaded preliminary meetings to agree on the meeting," Abbas said. Abbas summoned Israeli reporters to address the Israeli public directly. The Prime Minister's Office quickly denied the claim. "This is simply not right…This is simply Abu Mazen's [Abbas's] attempt to evade responsibility for the lack of negotiations."

Kerry: Some Iran Sanction Relief Could Fund Terror

John Kerry says it is likely that some of the billions of dollars in sanctions relief granted to Iran under a landmark nuclear deal will go to groups deemed terrorists. On the sidelines of the World Economic Forum in Davos, Kerry says there is little the US or others can do to prevent the now-unfrozen assets from getting into the hands of the Iran Revolutionary Guard Corps or "other entities" that Iran has supported in the past.

Ya'alon: Settlers Who Broke into Hebron Homes Trampled Law

Israeli security forces on Friday removed a group of settlers from two houses in Hebron, a day after they had moved into the buildings they claim to have purchased. A few dozen of the Hebron settlement's residents broke into the homes between the Cave of the Patriarchs and the neighborhood of Avraham Avinu on Thursday and announced that they had bought the buildings, which would in effect expand the settlement in the city. They called the homes "Beit Rachel" and "Beit Leah," after the biblical wives of Jacob.

Bibi: Growing Ties w/ Sunni Arabs Key to Palestinian Progress

Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told the World Economic Forum at Davos that Israel and Sunni Arab states are on the same side of the Middle East's rifts and frictions, and that this relationship can generate diplomatic progress with the Palestinians. Speaking in an on-stage interview with CNN's Fareed Zakaria, Netanyahu said "Saudi Arabia recognizes Israel is an ally rather than an enemy because of the two principle threats that threaten them, Iran and Daesh [ISIS]…Who can help us? They ask. Obviously Israel and the Sunni Arab states are not on opposite sides."

Odd Diplomatic Development as Greece, Cyprus Back Israel

Pundits would have been dismissed as clueless had they predicted a decade ago that in a critical European Union discussion on the Middle East, Greece and Cyprus would emerge as the countries that would – in the words of US President Barack Obama – "have Israel's back." Yet that is exactly what happened this week when Greece and Cyprus led a charge of about half a dozen eastern and southern European states to block the passage of language in an EU resolution on the Middle East "peace process" to differentiate the territories from Israel, a move that could have triggered a slew of measures that would make the recent labeling of settlement products seem tame by comparison.

IDF to Gaza Perimeter Residents: Hamas Ready for Next Round

"I came to the meeting calm and left troubled," said yesterday an employee of one of the local authorities in the Gaza perimeter, after a meeting with a high-ranking official from the Gaza Division who briefed local residents on Hamas's growing readiness for another clash with Israel. "Hamas in the Gaza Strip is now at a point where it has rehabilitated itself and is ready to fight Israel again, if need be," the high-ranking military official said. "It has restored the tunnels, its rocket, intelligence collection and observation systems, and it is ready for the order to be given." Although this was a routine meeting with employees of local authorities from the Gaza perimeter and Sderot that was scheduled in advance, the high-ranking officer managed to surprise many people in the briefing he gave, a year and a half after Operation Protective Edge.

U.S. Negotiator: Israel Rift Over Iran Deal Was 'Very Painful'

A top U.S. negotiator with Iran said enduring the tension the talks engendered between the Obama administration and Israel and the Jewish community was very painful. "For me personally, one of the most difficult parts was the tension with this beloved country and its people," said Wendy Sherman, who led the US team in the talks between Iran and six major powers leading to the sanctions relief for nuclear rollbacks deal. "So having the dissension and the difficulties that we had in this process — and with the American Jewish community of which I consider myself a part — was very, very painful," she said Tuesday at the Institute for National Security Studies in Tel Aviv.

Abu Mazen: I'm Not Inciting

By Nahum Barnea

Ramallah -- Abu Mazen, 81, looks great. His face is tanned, his back is straight, his speech is firm. It would seem that the reports of his imminent retirement and of the collapse of the Palestinian Authority, willingly or involuntarily, have filled him with fighting spirit. Ariel Sharon used to say that every time he thought of retiring, he looked at the line of people waiting to succeed him, and changed his mind. Abu Mazen may be undergoing a similar process. His retirement announcement given a few weeks ago gave rise to an ugly succession war among top Fatah members. The collateral damage, from our point of view, was the competition among the candidates as to who could be more hostile and more bellicose towards Israel. "I am not retiring," Abu Mazen told us last night.

He invited a group of journalists from the Israeli media outlets to his office in the mukataa. As usual with the Palestinians, it was difficult to decipher the message, to determine what the media spin was, and why now of all times. It is reasonable to assume that the assessment by Israeli officials that the Palestinian Authority might soon collapse had reinvigorated Abu Mazen. You say that we're going to collapse? In your face.

And perhaps all he wants is to return the PA to the Israeli agenda, and Palestine to the international agenda.

"There are no negotiations between me and Netanyahu," he clarified, "but there are daily talks between the bureaus." He refused to say who maintained the relationship on the Israeli side; he was probably referring to Attorney Yitzhak Molcho or to Coordinator of Government Activities in the Territories Maj. Gen. Yoav Mordechai. But he insisted that talks were being held. The only name he mentioned was the name of former minister Silvan Shalom. "He would call from time to time," he said. When we reminded him that Shalom had resigned, he added with a smile: "In the past."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The purpose of the talks, Abu Mazen said, was to arrange a meeting between him and Netanyahu, and perhaps beforehand a preparatory meeting at a lower level. "Two months ago I approached Netanyahu, but he didn't get back to me," he said. Netanyahu's bureau denied last night in response to Abu Mazen's statements that talks were being held. "Netanyahu," his bureau stated, "wants to renew the negotiations without preconditions. Abu Mazen refuses."

Abu Mazen confirmed that he was posing two conditions: a construction freeze in the settlements and implementation of the fourth phrase of the prisoner release. "These are not preconditions," he said. "The entire international community says that construction in the settlements is illegal and is opposed to UN resolutions. As for the prisoner release, there is an agreement and the Israeli government has to uphold it."

He announced two foreign policy objectives for the near future: firstly, convening an international peace conference to discuss the conflict, in the format of the Annapolis conference of 2007.

The conference would promote the Saudi peace initiative, which Abu Mazen supports. Secondly, an application to the UN institutions, which will be made if and when the committee appointed by the Arab League decides to do so. The committee consists of Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, the Palestinian Authority and the Arab League secretary general.

We asked about the things that trouble the Israelis: The wave of terrorism, the security coordination, the incitement, the assistance that the PA grants to families of terrorists, Abu Mazen's refusal to recognize Israel as the Jewish nation-state.

He did not justify the wave of terrorism; he interpreted it. He said that the terrorism had broken out now because of: 1. The lack of a political horizon; 2. Settler attacks, such as the murder of the Dawabshe family; 3. The el-Aksa Mosque affair. At this point, he accused Israeli ministers of staging provocations on the Temple Mount, which turn the conflict from political into religious. The ministers' statements serve the goals of global terror organizations, which seek to take el-Aksa under their wing, he said.

The PA honors the security coordination agreement, he stressed. We take a lot of criticism over this, but don't pay attention to it. "Today the coordination exists in full," he said. "We prevent terrorism in our territory and prevent the spillover of terrorism into Israel. What will be tomorrow I don't know." The tone he used was free of a veiled threat. As for the substance, I am less sure.

He insisted that he was not inciting. There was a joint committee on the battle against incitement, he said. We want to renew its activity but Israel refuses. As for the salaries he pays to families of terrorists and the commemoration of *shahid*s, he explained these by a law from Arafat's time and Palestinian culture. Along the way, he related that the PA was paying a salary to the family of a Palestinian who was executed during Arafat's time on charges of spying for Israel. Like the Israelis, Abu Mazen knows that there is always a previous government that can be blamed.

The demand to recognize Israel as a Jewish state is an invention of Netanyahu, he argued. The fact is that Israel did not pose such a demand to Egypt and Jordan when it signed peace agreements with them.

Ramallah by night is a peaceful city, as peaceful as Tel Aviv. The main streets are filled with cars. The neon signs of the stores are filled with writing in English. Like Tel Aviv, but without the terror attacks. That too is an interesting message that came out of the meeting with Abu Mazen.

Why One Former IDF Chief of Staff Could Be Heading for Politics

By Mazal Mualem

In the months that immediately followed the 2013 election, the Labor Party under Shelly Yachimovich was left licking its wounds after another resounding failure at the polls. At the time, former Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi was mentioned as someone who could pull the party out of its morass and lead it back to power .

Proponents of the idea included former minister and then-Knesset member Binyamin Ben-Eliezer and the Chairman of the Histadrut Labor Union Ofer Eini. Both Eini and Ben-Eliezer were close to Ashkenazi, who ranked high in popularity polls. They both believed that he could extract himself from the public imbroglio he had gotten into as a result of his fierce disagreements with Minister of Defense Ehud Barak. Eini and Ben-Eliezer were supposed to be Ashkenazi's turbo engines, when he ran in the primaries for head of the Labor Party. They planned to present the former chief of staff as an updated version of Yitzhak Rabin in 1992 and of Ehud Barak in 1999 — former generals appointed chair of the party who managed to bring the party back to power.

At the time, Eini and Ben-Eliezer also claimed, and rightly so, that the Harpaz scandal (allegedly involving Boaz Harpaz, an associate of Ehud Barak, and forged documents concerning Ashkenazi's successor) was only of interest to the press. The story was too convoluted to interest the public and affect its attitudes toward Ashkenazi. Polls conducted at the time, including polls immediately following the release of the first draft of the State Comptroller's serious report about Ashkenazi in March 2012, proved that his popularity barely suffered as a result of the scandal. On the contrary, the public remembered him fondly for rehabilitating the Israel Defense Forces after the Second Lebanon War in 2006, with its controversial results. In other words, even after he got himself entangled in the Harpaz affair, Ashkenazi was still a hot political item. He had the reputation of a folksy figure who was not afraid of conflict, but also as someone with moderate political views. In the leadership vacuum in the center-left, Ashkenazi stood out .

Even with the law requiring military brass to have a "cooling off" period before they enter politics, Ashkenazi would have been eligible to run in February 2014. Nevertheless, he was in no hurry. He enjoyed being courted by politicians, and explained that he would not take any action until the entire Harpaz affair was over. That finally happened

Jan. 20, more than five years after it all began. Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein announced that he would not be indicting Ashkenazi over the Harpaz affair.

Nevertheless, it is not at all certain that the former chief of staff will indeed enter politics, and even if he does, it is still not certain that he will do so as part of the Zionist Camp (previous the Labor Party). Eini and Ben-Eliezer are no longer there to pave the way for him, and current Chairman Isaac Herzog has no intention of giving up his seat without a fight. Meanwhile, Herzog made do with tweeting congratulations to Ashkenazi now that the case against him has been closed.

Chairman of Yesh Atid Yair Lapid also took to Twitter to congratulate Ashkenazi , though in his case it is more than highly likely that a personal conversation was also involved. He has been courting Ashkenazi for months.

Lapid is offering him the No. 2 spot in the party in the next elections and naming him as Yesh Atid's candidate for defense minister. But as we have already noted, Ashkenazi is in no hurry. The very fact that Lapid is so interested in him shows that he is still popular with the public and, therefore, a valuable asset. This is especially true since Lapid suffers from a dearth of security credentials. He needs people like Ashkenazi to draw voters from the moderate right. Then there is the fact that Ashkenazi is of Middle Eastern origin (Mizrahi in Hebrew) on his mother's side — a factor that could help Lapid shatter Yesh Atid's reputation as a party of Israeli Jews of European origin (Ashkenazi in Hebrew).

The bottom line is that the Harpaz affair did not destroy Ashkenazi's public career. He can even use it now to his political advantage by claiming that Ehud Barak and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu tried to eliminate him out of fear that he might threaten their status. Furthermore, the attorney general's decision to close the criminal case against him could become a badge of integrity. Even after the authorities listened to 100,000 recordings of phone calls he made as chief of staff, they found no evidence to indict him. Nevertheless, it is also worth noting that the report released by Weinstein this week refers to a behavior that was allegedly harmful to national security. This means that if Ashkenazi does decide to enter politics, he will need the skin of an elephant to withstand all sorts of artillery attacks. The big question is whether the former chief of staff has what it takes.

Can he contend with a brutal, highly focused campaign against him? The way things seem now, the answer is no. Ashkenazi's actions over the past few years indicate that he lacks this ability. He is easily insulted, extremely sensitive to criticism and wary of every word written about him. These particular traits only grew more pronounced as a result of the Harpaz affair. In many ways, the former chief of staff is now an exhausted man. It is not at all sure if he still has the appetite needed to wage a campaign for the office of prime minister.

"Ashkenazi neither looks nor sounds like someone with an urgent need to get into politics and prove something. He needs time," a political figure who spoke with him told Al-Monitor on condition of anonymity. Fortunately for Ashkenazi — and for the politicians courting him, too — there are no elections on the horizon. In other words, he is under no pressure to decide right now.

Given the current leadership crisis within the political center-left, Ashkenazi will likely be courted by these parties up until the next election. His name will come up again and again as a potential partner in all sorts of political alliances, whether it is with Yair Lapid, Isaac Herzog or even Gideon Saar of the Likud. After all, they all share one main objective: removing Netanyahu from power.

CLYDEWILLIAMS2016

Dear Friend,

As we look forward to 2016, it is a time of reflection on what's important in our lives and how we can make a difference. Our Christmas toy drive for needy children in East Harlem was a great way for my daughter to understand the importance of giving back to the community.

On the campaign front, I got some good news as well - which is polling showing this Congressional race is 'wide open'.

This race will be hard-fought, but with your support, I'm confident I can prevail. Will you help kick-off the 2016 campaign season by supporting my campaign today - before the Dec 31st deadline ?

The NY-13 community wants new leadership and new ideas. We need leaders that will bring people together and put the community interests ahead of special interests.

Join me in the journey - and let's win in 2016!

I hope you are all having a happy holiday season,

Clyde

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 08/07/08

Main Topics: Negative ads, demonstrators in WV, Oldy McOlderson and offshore drilling

Summary: President Bush issues a blunt condemnation of China's human rights record from Thailand. China bans a former US Olympian who advocates for peace in Sudan. Pollutions and protests on the Great Wall mar China's opening days of the Olympics. Authorities continue their search for the missing child, Caylee Marie Anthony. Mid-morning numbers show that the numbers of jobless claims have soared to the highest rates in six years.

Two controversies on the democratic side of presidential politics: Hillary Clinton suggests her supporters nominate her at the convention and pundits take issue with Obama's proposed aggressive taxation of oil companies. Cable stations host panels on the new poll that shows many voters feel Obama is overexposed. The tire pressure debate continues. Paris Hilton ad continues to receive substantial coverage on FNC and CNN. No mention of the Straight Talk Express' collision with a minivan.

Highlights:
1. McCain's negative ads
   a. FNC: Giuliani on McCain's sense of humor and Bush's legacy
   b. FNC: Pfotenhauer plugs the new ad and defends the old
   c. CBS: Anchorwoman and GOP strategist consider McCain's negative strategy
2. WCHS-ABC: Demonstrators welcome McCain in West Virginia
3. CC: Stewart exposes McCain's altered messaging on offshore drilling

Highlights No Clip:
1) MSNBC – RUDY GIULIANI: 'I think all of [McCain's ads] are funny. […] It's the summertime. I'm not offended by it.'
2) CNN – ED HENRY: '[John McCain is] trying to test out a new message. He's trying to seize back the mantel of change. You know know Barack Obama talks about and bills himself as the candidate of change. John McCain is trying to assert he's that guy.'

Clips:
Highlight #1
Giuliani Raves About McCain's Sense of Humor and Bush's Presidential Legacy (FNC 08/07/08 08:27am)
RUDY GIULIANI: But that was the reason for the criticism. It wasn't that Barack Obama said to inflate your tires. He said that inflating your tires would make up for not doing offshore drilling, which he's against. Of course that's silly, I mean the statement, so he's kind of changed his position to protect himself.

GRETCHEN CARLSON: Did you happen to see the Paris Hilton response ad to the celeb ad?

GIULIANI: Yes I did, I thought it was hilarious. […] I'm sure John loves it too. John has a great, haven't had the chance to talk to him about it yet, but John McCain has a great sense of humor.

BRIAN KILMEADE: […] if you had to give some advice to Barack Obama what would you say?

GIULIANI: I would say to him, why don't you go do those town hall meetings with John McCain. Get rid of all this, you know, sound bite stuff and half statements. Go do 20 or 30 of those town hall meetings, get up in front of 100 people, 200 people, 300 people, whatever it is, let them question you. And then we'll find out who really has the answers. I think that's the best test.

CARLSON: But wait a minute, you're still giving the advice to Senator John McCain when you give that advice to Barack Obama because a lot of people criticize that he wouldn't do well in those town meetings.

GIULIANI: Well we will find out. If he's not going to do well in those town hall meetings then he's not going to do well or he his. That I think would be the best test of if you're ready to be, ready to be President. Let the American people go question you. With all due respect to all the reporters and everything, I found that to be the most difficult part and the most challenging part. The town hall meeting, even more than the debates. […]

BRIAN KILMEADE: John McCain, two days ago, cut an ad saying that I am not better off than I was four years ago under George Bush. Two Republicans, he's distancing himself from the president and he cut a voiceover and got video to prove it. How difficult was it for him and Number 2 should he have done it.

GIULIANI: Well there are all different ways of doing it. He has to show that he is independent of George Bush. This is the problem Al Gore had in 2000, it's the problem President Bush 41 had in 88', he had to distance himself from Ronald Reagan. And sometimes maybe you're going to step over the line a little and offend someone for doing it. But I think the point hat John wants to make is that he's an independent guy. And boy, you gotta say that about John. He's always been independent. This is not going to be a continuation of the George Bush administration. I'm a big supporter of the President, I think this country is better off because George Bush was our President. He made the one big decision, the most important decision of his Presidency correctly. And I think in history he's going to be a very good President for that reason. But there are a lot of things were he differs from, where John differs from President Bush and he has a right to point that out.

Nancy Pfotenhauer Defends The Obama Celebrity Ad and Plugs the New Raising McCain Video (FNC 08/07/08 09:30am)
BILL: HEMMER: From Presidential candidate now to a YouTube sensation almost overnight. Some of John McCain's ads, like the one comparing Barack Obama to the likes of Paris Hilton and Britney Spears, are working. According to YouTube, the ads have helped rocket McCain's page on the site in only 7 days. While these ads can be catchy, can they end up hurting McCain in the long run? […] Why do you think this ad is working?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: […] Oh because I think the American people, while we understand the challenges that we are facing, enjoy a good laugh once in a while and they actually respect and admire someone who's in the arena who keeps their sense of humor. […]

HEMMER: So you think it's just a laugh in the end then? Is Paris Hilton the kind of, well the kind of American you want to draft off of?

PFOTENHAUER: Well what we did is a nod to Senator Obama's celebrity after a week of wall-to-wall just fulsome praise in media coverage that was basically something you could complain about or laugh about. So we did a nod to the celebrity and then we went on to talk about serious issues like energy prices and Senator Obama's lack of an energy plan. […] So we always have some substance in there we just had a little fun with it, and the American people have responded.

HEMMER: […] Some are saying that it's ok if it comes from somewhere else but not directly from the McCain campaign because it could backfire on you. Their logic, and what they suggest, is the media is already picking up on the celebrity thing anyways.

PFOTENHAUER: Well if they were it wasn't coming through. There's something like 40% of Americans that think the media is in the tank for Senator Obama and had said that. Basically said that they were trying to actively midwife, if you will, the Obama candidacy. Just yesterday a PEW Research Poll came out that said about 48% of the American public think they've heard too much about him, and that includes 30% of the Democrats that were surveyed. So I think if anything the burden is on the other foot if you will or the other side.

HEMMER: Now before we go overboard with the technology attention, to be clear, Barack Obama's YouTube page has 40 million hits, John McCain's has 8 million. Now there's this debate as to whether or not the young people of America will decide the next President come November 4th. And if you go back over time, history says that even though a lot of people talk about that there is no proof that young people actually turn out in the numbers some campaigns hope or project. Do you have evidence at the moment that that will change in 2008?

PFOTENHAUER: We don't have evidence, but Senator McCain is campaigning for every vote and he's doing it by crisscrossing the country and interacting directly with voters, wherever possible. He prefers less scripted, real direct conversation and dialogue […] But we are also going to bring the debate to the American people through whatever mechanisms we can and we are going to invite their engagement and we're gonna, we're happy to share a chuckle with them or have a serious conversation with them about the economy and bringing energy prices down. So it's a very balanced effort on our part and I would just encourage your viewers to check on the web for "Raising McCain". Which is the new one that just came out this morning, and I personally watched it two or three times before doing this segment because it was so much fun.

HEMMER: Well I'll try to queue that up before I get out of here.

CBS Anchor and GOP Strategist Evaluate McCain's Negative Ads (CBS 08/07/08 7:17am)
MAGGIE RODRIGUEZ: Let's begin with the [ad] that started this negative tide, John McCain's ad last week comparing Barack Obama to celebrities, Paris Hilton and Britney Spears. […]. Even though he was being criticized, do you think this was an effective ad because it got people talking about McCain again?

ED ROLLINS: Well, it was a very effective ad because, for the first time since really February, the equal news coverage for the week [sic] and it was about this ad. Network television, cable television put this on and made it work. At the end of the day, the message is he's not ready to lead and I think that's, in essence, what McCain wanted to do.

[McCain's 'real Obama' ad]

RODRIGUEZ: So still a jab about the celebrity, but much more on message.

ROLLINS: It's definitely on message and the message obviously are the things that are the negatives, but I think the key thing here is it's building on the celebrity, this is a guy who, four years ago, basically nobody knew who he was. Now they do. He's very famous, but there's no substance and I think that's their message.

RODRIGUEZ: And also when they say things like he's going to raise your taxes, which they focused much more on this ad than in the first one….

ROLLINS: That's the message you wanna drive. This is an ad that'll work in August. It may not work in October, but the message of raising taxes will definitely work in October and I think you're gonna keep hearing that over and over again.

RODRIGUEZ: All right, Barack Obama says that John McCain is taking the low road. He's supposed to be a straight-talker who doesn't resort to this sort of thing, but he has […].

RODRIGUEZ: What do you think?

ROLLINS: Well, he's responding to McCain. The truth of the matter is you want to run your own campaign. You don't want to respond to the opposition. That's the basic rule, but I think he thinks the ads must have been effective enough that he's out there responding already.

Once again, this is August so what goes on in September, October may be a totally different game.

RODRIGUEZ: You don't think that Barack Obama pointing out John McCain's weaknesses, in his view, is a good strategy?

ROLLINS: Well, it's a good strategy. If he can make […] McCain a grumpy, old man, as opposed to a significant commander-in-chief, he's done his job and I think that's what he wants to do. He's the more likable candidate, by an overwhelming margin, but, in the end, these undecided voters often vote for the person they like the most.

McCain Doesn't Have Virginia in His Pocket, Resident Declares (WCHS ABC 08/06/08 11:03pm)
RICK LORD: With the days and months ticking away toward the presidential election, both candidates are hitting the campaign trail hard ahead of their party's conventions.

ELIZABETH NOREIKA: Republican candidate, John McCain is taking the mountain state votes seriously. The senator visited West Virginia today. McCain stopped in Huntington this morning where he took in a Marshall football team practice. McCain also spoke to the players about how he learned about Marshall University.

JOHN MCCAIN: The great tragedy in 1970 obviously. Then, of course, it was all brought back to us with that wonderful film, which we see over and over again, I'm happy to say. On cable, I've seen it a couple of times and so it's just a symbol to America and I'm proud to be here.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

NOREIKA: McCain rode on a bus tour through Ohio. The ride was with limited members of the media, including our own Kennie Bass. And this is to be expected with any political visit, you can almost always count on protesters.

LORD: Eyewitness News reporter, Bryant Somerville talks with Barack Obama supporters who say despite West Virginia polls showing McCain in the lead, this race is far from over.

BRYANT SOMERVILLE: While Senator John McCain's Straight Talk Express was pulling in, his protesters were walking up, shouting for who they believe should be the next president and wanting McCain to know that West Virginia is not in his back pocket just yet.

MATT SOWARDS: We're showing John McCain that this is not a given for him and he's gonna have to work for West Virginia just like Senator Obama is and has been doing.

SOMERVILLE: Matt Sowards says Senator Barack Obama offers today's youth something McCain doesn't and says Obama is to him what President John Kennedy was to his parents.

SOWARDS: We see the same message of hope and change and prosperity that we haven't had through the course of our lifetime.

DEMONSTRATORS: Who do we need? Obama! What for? President!

VICTOR WILSON: We need to come together as one nation. We need to set aside our racial differences. We need to look to somebody who has the vision, the strength, the organizational skill and the eloquence to save this nation.

SOMERVILLE: Something these protesters say can only happen with Obama. They say demonstrating is the best way to let the Arizona senator know how they feel.

SOMERVILLE: We have a great opportunity to come out and make a stand and show that young people care about what's going on in our government, what's going on in Washington.

LORD: Others making their opinions known today said West Virginians are sick of the way President Bush has run things for the past 8 years. To break away from that, they say Senator Obama is who we need in the White House.

Highlight #3
Stewart Reminds Us that McCain is So Old, Out of Touch and Deceptive It's Funny (Comedy Central 08/06/08 11:02pm)
JOHN STEWART: […] Seven and a half years ago the Bush-Cheney administration promised us a comprehensive energy policy. Six years into the war on terror they promised us a path to energy independence and finally a couple of weeks ago they said, 'Ah, f*ck it. How 'bout we just look under Florida?'

[…] Luckily the two presidential candidates aren't fighting the drilling demon.

JOHN MCCAIN: With those resources, which would take years to develop, it would only postpone or temporarily relieve our dependency on fossil fuels.

JOHN STEWART: Fossil fuels? You know, um. I did this with the world 'telegraph' last week, so I'm gonna go ahead and put 'fossil' on the list of words McCain should probably never use. If you freeze there you'll see 'contraption' and 'dagnabbit.'

So both presidential candidates saying, 'Drilling isn't the answer,' but that was months ago. A simpler time. People left their doors unlocked. On a Friday night, they'd take their best girls, in a Studebaker, down to the malt shop. Gas was only $3.69 a gallon. Times have changed.

MCCAIN: We need to drill here and we need to drill now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

STEWART: You know you're standing inside, right? It's a label factory in Pennsylvania. You'd just hit the basement. Go ahead, drill!

The Administration's own Department of Energy says the effects of drilling now wouldn't even be felt until 2030. Unless we could somehow whittle that figure down.

STEPHEN MOORE: It's clear that it's going to take somewhere between four and six years before the time they start drilling 'til the time we actually get that gasoline in our tank.

ALISYN CAMEROTA: Two to four years is a conservative estimate.

EXPERT: It would take two or three years before it got in the US market.

SEAN HANNITY: Within two years—

MCCAIN: Oil company executives say that as short [of] a time as one-two years.

CHARLIE CRIST: I've talked to people in the business who say that, within a year and a half they can have oil—

MCCAIN: —is to increase our oil supply in a matter of months.

STEWART: Drilling offshore has already saved us! Cyborgs from the future have been sent here to drill offshore to prevent Osama bin Laden from killing John Connor! Have sex with them and become your own grandfather.

Nice cave, McCain! Obama, scold 'im.

[Stewart becomes frustrated at Obma's compromise. Then moves to the topic of tire gauges.]

MCCAIN: My opponent doesn't want to drill! He doesn't want nuclear power! He wants you to inflate your tires!

STEWART: He's a queer! This is America! If I'm gonna inflate my tires, I'm gonna inflate 'em with oil! Be like drivin' on a waterbed.

Senator McCain took his message of ending our dependence on oil to the annual Sturgis motorcycle rally and crystal meth Olympics in South Dakota.

MCCAIN: As you may know, not long ago, a couple a hundred thousand Berliners made a lot of noise for my opponent. I'll take the roar of 50,000 Harleys any day! Any day, my friends.

[McCain twirls his finger around. Stewart imitates the gesture.]

STEWART: Any day! Any day! Any day that we're not locked in a global battle with oil-producing terrorist states. You guys are actually being quite wasteful right now. You're making things worse, but, for some reason, they just kept with the vroom vroom.

MCCAIN: This is my first time here, but I recognize that sound. It's the sound of freedom.

STEWART: No, it's the sound of money being funneled to Saudi Arabia. Luckily, many in the audience soon ran out of freedom juice and McCain was able to continue.

MCCAIN: I was lookin' at the Sturgis schedule and noticed that you have a beauty pageant and so I encouraged Cindy to compete.

[crowd roars in applause]

STEWART: Ooh, a beauty pageant. So what do you guys do? Get Mario Lopez to host and the girls do a little evening gown thing? Do we have any footage of the contest from years past?

[Young lady in bikini dances about]

BEAUTY PAGEANT MC: Yeah. Go, go. Buffalo-style.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[woman removes shorts]

Hey, come on guys! Make some noise!

[woman inserts banana in mouth suggestively]

You likee? You like the banana show?

[cut back to Stewart, slightly mortified]

STEWART: […] As you can imagine, that was the talent show. It's quite a spectacle! So, to sum up: tuning up your cars and keeping your tires inflated is unbelievably gay and only encourages the terrorists, but stationary, yet still roaring engines, combined with alcohol-fueled banana oral sex demonstrations are….

MCCAIN: You're the heart and soul of America!

STEWART: By the way, after all that, this is what McCain said yesterday, 'Sen. Obama a couple of days ago said that we ought to all inflate our tires, and I don't disagree with that. The American Automobile Association strongly recommends it,' adding, 'Vroom?'

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 07/17/08

Main Topics: Hagel, NAACP, Kimmel mocks Czechoslovakia gaffe,

Summary of Shift: While news relating to the poor economy continued to lead the cycle this morning, most of the stories drifted between entertainment related clips, vice presidential speculation, and other items that could charitably be called fluff. An extended recording of Jesse Jackson's derogatory comments about Obama gained some traction because of Jackson's use of the N word. A group of US airways pilots placed a newspaper ad accusing executives at the company of "intimidation" and that the execs forced the pilots to fly at dangerously slow speeds to save fuel. Despite prior statements that no talks will be held, the Undersecretary of State, William Burns will be attending an international meeting in Iran about nuclear programs, and a diplomatic presence will be established in Iran. Most surprisingly there was no coverage of McCain's Afghanistan speech today.However some stations reported a need for more troops in Afghanistan but most are tied down in Iraq. Other foreign policy related news reflected polls this week which showed McCain stronger than Obama as commander in chief.

Scarborough Notes Surge Wasn't McCain's Idea (MSNBC 07/17/08)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: That's fine. It's George Bush's surge. I will say John McCain was the one man in Washington who supported that it seemed at the time. But, I wouldn't go around saying that was McCain's idea.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: I'm thinking…

WILLIE GESIT: Or that he was the one that wanted Rumsfeld out.

BREZINSKI: Um well give him the credit for not liking Rumsfeld. There was a little friction there.

SCARBOROUGH: He did say Rumsfeld should be fired.

BRZEZINSKI: I think there was legitimate friction.

SCARBOROUGH: Yeah well everybody except George Bush.

Highlight #2
Jimmy Kimmel Highlights Czechoslovakia Gaffe, Plays Mock Ad Of Other Long Gone Countries McCain Would Help (ABC 07-17-08)
JIMMY KIMMEL: Senator John McCain of Arizona is a little confused. Twice in the last few days reference to the country of Czechoslovakia, unfortunately, Czechoslovakia has not existed as a country for about fifteen years. It's two countries now; it's the Czech Republic and Slovakia. And you'd think a guy who can memorize all the items on the early bird menu at Co Co's would get that straight but he can't. And now, some people are worried McCain might be out of touch, a concern his campaign today addressed sternly in this ad we made up.

AD NARRATOR: John McCain will stand strong for America's values abroad. He will fight for freedom in Iraq, Afghanistan, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Abyssinia, Transjordan, Zanzibar, and the Ottoman Empire. And John McCain will stop America's number one enemy: Adolph Hitler. And, he'll free the slaves. John McCain for President. I'm John McCain and I approve this message.

John McCain gets "Kudos for Coming" at the NAACP Conference but Little Else (CNN 07/17/08 08:13am)

JOHN ROBERTS: John McCain is probably going to have a hard time convincing African American voters to choose him over Barack Obama. But that wont keep him from trying.

DANA BASH: If your audience is the NAACP and your opponent would be the first black President, you start here:

JOHN MCCAIN: Don't tell him I said this, but he's an impressive fellow in many ways.

BASH: That was John McCain's biggest applause line, an ice breaker about Barack Obama, who got a thunderous reception two days earlier. McCain was greeted with mostly polite clapping; one person was so indifferent he read the paper. McCain came armed with new education initiatives.

MCCAIN: The worst problems of our public school system are often found in black communities.

BASH: He pushed merit pay for teachers, and hit Obama for opposing school vouchers.

MCCAIN: All that went over well with the teachers union, but where does it leave families and their children that are left in failing schools.

BASH: The reaction: Dead Silence. McCain's chances at winning black votes are incredibly steep. A fresh New York Times Poll shows 89% of black voters support Obama, just 2% say they'll vote for McCain.

MCCAIN: Whether or not I win your support, I need your goodwill and your council.

BASH: But McCain came looking mostly for just that: goodwill, to show that he's a different kind of Republican. After George Bush was elected he didn't attend the NAACP Conference for 6 years. McCain came and even it opened it up for questions. […] This teacher in an Obama teacher that says teachers can't afford food.

TEACHER: What are you going to do Senator, we can't continue this way.

DANA: I want to reward good teachers.

BASH: If nothing else, kudos for coming. […]

Local Nebraska Station Covers McCain Limiting Press, Praising Hagel (ABC-KETV 07-16-08)

TODD ANDREWS: A final stop at the strategic air and space museum, his campaign put tight restrictions on what we could show you but we were able to sit down and talk with him briefly. He signaled he was willing to fight hard for Nebraska votes. This despite the history of the state as friendly territory for Republican Presidential hopefuls. Senator John McCain took to the midlands this Wednesday. The Republican Presidential hopefully stopped at Warner Enterprises in Omaha talking to employees about the economy and revisiting campaign promises about the gas tax relief.

JOHN MCCAIN: Americans are hurting right now. Let's give them a little break. That was just stop number one for McCain after he landed at Epply at midday. A bit later supporters, including state GOP leaders, were eagerly awaiting his arrival at a 1,000 a plate dinner. $1,000-a-plate fundraising dinner at the strategic air and space museum.

GOVERNOR HEINMAN: I think it's important that we have a man who will hopefully be the next president of the united states right here in the eastern part of the state.

MCCAIN: I think the campaign may be won or lost to a large degree by a lot of the ANDEWRS: We spoke to McCain one-on-one just before the fundraiser. Among the chief issues on his mind: fighting hard for the hearts of Nebraska voters and not assuming anything.

MCCAIN: I'm confident of winning Nebraska - but I have to campaign everywhere; I have to convince every voter.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ANDREWS: McCain hopes to win them over by pressing home his message of experience and reiterating the differences between his ideas and those of Barack Obama. McCain believes his ideas resonate better with Nebraskans; especially when it comes to energy and taxes.

MCCAIN: They want us to drill offshore, and they want us to go with nuclear power and solar and tide and wind. And they want their taxes kept low. Senator Obama will raise their taxes, I'll lower them.

ANDREWS: And in regards to his chances nationwide this November? Well he readably acknowledges the campaign trail ahead is a long one.

MCCAIN: We're in a very competitive race. I'm the underdog; we've got a lot of work to do.

ANDREWS: Among the other topics discussed with McCain today: his thoughts on VP rumors surrounding US Senator Chuck as Hagel is set to accompany Barack Obama on a trip to the Middle East. McCain actually said he's "pleased" that Hagel is going on that trip and McCain says he's not worried about whether it's pertinent for the Presidential race ahead.

KRISTI ANDERSEN: Thanks Todd. As we mentioned there were several rules McCain had in place for who we could and could not have access to. One of the things we weren't allowed into: the actually fundraising event.

NICHOLE BERLIE: Meantime Nebraska Democrats poked fun at the 1,000 a plate dinner with their own fundraiser of 5 dollar a head hot dog dinner at Mahoney State Park. Democratic leaders say their ability to throw together this last minute event shows that their party is energized for this election.

Main Topics: Troopergate Investigation, Palin Returns to Alaska, Sad/Lonely Solo McCain, 'Third Term' Promotion

Summary of Shift:

The Obama "lipstick on a pig" comments continue to generate discussion now that Obama has hit back, saying enough of the silly politics. John McCain and Sarah Palin had their last joint campaign event together yesterday in Virginia, their largest crowds yet, before Palin returns to Alaska to speak at her son Track's troop deployment to Iraq. Palin was both praised for drawing huge excitement and large crowds to McCain's events in the past week, with many speculating that it'll be quiet for McCain on the road without her. Some bloggers and commentators have even suggested that the ticket should be flipped, as Palin is the real star. But with new celebrity comes judgment and investigations into Palin's record continue to draw concerns over her attempts to ban library books, her flip flop on the bridge to nowhere, and a state investigation into the firing of her Public Safety Commissioner over personal reasons.

Today is the seventh anniversary of the September 11th terrorist attacks, with McCain, Obama, Bush, and others giving speeches, reflecting, and paying their respects with the rest of the nation and the world on this day that changed America and Republican political strategy forever. Paul Begala was on the Today show promoting his new book and movie, "Third Term". It was revealed that President Bush signed off on secret raids on Taliban militants and Osama Bin Laden within Pakistan several months ago, without the government of Pakistan's approval. Investigators at the Department of the Interior say 19 government workers accepted gifts, rigged contracts, and engaged in illicit sex with energy company executives. Failed to collect in $10 billion dollars in oil revenues last year. FEMA blamed for wasting at least $1 billion dollars in aftermath of Hurricane Katrina. Hurricane Ike approaches the Texas Gulf Coast as a Category 3 storm.

Highlights, No YouTubes:

1. CBS - CRAIG FERGUSON: Why are we talking about animals in cosmetics? Why is John McCain hanging around while his vice presidential candidate is out campaigning to be President?
2. ABC - GEORGE STEPHANOPOULIS: They come from the Quinnipiac polling service, a very reliable polling service, and they show a close race. It is likely to go down to the wire again. John McCain ahead by seven points in Florida, 50 to 43. But Barack Obama ahead in the other two big swing battleground states, 49 to 44 in Ohio, remember George Bush one that state four years ago, and 48 to 45 in Pennsylvania. That's a little closer than Barack Obama might like, but remember if you go back to 1960 no one has won the presidency without winning two of these three big battleground states. And Obama ahead in two of them right now. […] If you're going to pay attention to one state this year, it's got to be Ohio. No Republican has ever won the presidency without winning Ohio, and again, we remember four years ago it was so close there. George W. Bush winning by only about 100,000 votes. Both campaigns are targeting now, the Obama campaign has ramped up their turnout operation, particularly in the big cities and on college campuses. But the McCain campaign hopes the pick of Sarah Palin will energize their voters, particularly in Southern Ohio.
3. FNC - CHRIS KOFINIS: I think part of it had to do with that people weren't really happy with John McCain as a candidate. And I think, to that extent, the McCain campaign did a smart thing by choosing someone that was going to excite their base.

GMA Investigates Sarah Palin's Troopergate Scandal (ABC 09/11/08 7:30am)
BRIAN ROSS: This is the most serious cloud hanging over Sarah Palin, a state investigation into whether she lied or abused her power as governor when she fired the Alaska Public Safety Commissioner two months ago. And it has turned into a major issue in the state. This April, at a conference at Alaska's Epidemic Problem of Domestic and Sexual Violence, Governor Sarah Palin had nothing but praise for the work of Public Safety Commissioner Walt Monigan.

SARAH PALIN: An indication of our commitment is the participation here of my, of our Department of Public Safety Commissioner Walt Monigan's participation here, and all of his hard work. And I want to publicly thank him.

ROSS: Three months later, she fired Monigan, supposedly because he was not a team player on budget issues. But Monigan spent the day Wednesday testifying before an Alaska investigator, saying that the real reason for his abrupt dismissal was that he refused to fire the Governor's ex-brother-in-law from the state police, after a messy divorce. Monigan declined to comment as he left. Governor Palin calls Monigan's claims outrageous. But Monigan told ABC News he would provide the committee with proof to back up his claim that she abused her office to settle a personal score.

SEN. HOLLIS FRENCH: She had two conversations with Walt Monigan, and had sent him some emails. So the idea that there had been no contact and no pressure doesn't stand up.

ROSS: The case is the talk of Alaska. And Monigan is now picking up support in his battle against Palin from groups involved in protecting women from domestic and sexual abuse, like those at this Anchorage shelter. It was a cause Monigan had embraced.

GERAN TARR: When she let go of Commissioner Monigan, the women's lobby and our members were disappointed.

ROSS: Some women's groups say the Governor, unlike Monigan, has failed to take decisive action to support programs to protect women like Maxxie, nearly beaten to death by her husband. According to the FBI, Alaska is first in the nation per capita for rapes and second for murder of women by men.

TARR: We have not seen Governor Palin do anything that would indicate this is a priority.

ROSS: The Governor's former press secretary says Palin does care about the issue deeply.

MEGAN STAPLETON: One of the Governor's number one priorities since first taking office has always been to attack domestic violence in the state of Alaska.

ROSS: But at the Domestic Violence Conference in April, Palin said the proof of her concern for the issue was her Public Safety Commissioner, Walt Monigan.

PALIN: Not just talking about it, but finding the solutions and plugging them in, and I want to publicly thank Walt for having his heart in the right place in his efforts too.

ROSS: The man she would later fire. The state committee wants to issue a final report in the next few weeks. The McCain campaign has launched an attack on its credibility, saying for or five of its members are democrats supporting Barack Obama. They fail to tell us that the other ten members of the committee are Republicans.

Army of Bush Aides Working With Palin In Preparation of Solo Campaigning/Interviews (ABC 09/11/08 7:15am)
GEORGE STEPHANOPOULIS: […] There is some danger in John McCain in the silly season as well, as he throws out these attacks day after day they may put Obama on the defensive, but at least the Obama campaign hopes that they also may start to chip away at John McCain's maverick record and his reputation for integrity.

ROBIN ROBERTS: Obama wants to focus on the economy, but as you know, the focus has been on Governor Sarah Palin. She has a big interview today in Alaska with our Charlie Gibson. And her popularity no doubt is soaring, but this is the first time she's had to answer questions about her record. What does she need to do

STEPHANOPOULIS: Well you know, she's been cramming for this as well. There's an army of former Bush aides who are out there working with her every free moment between her stump speeches. She's got to show that she can handle the questions, show that she's ready for this job as vice president, and show familiarity with the issues. We'll see how it goes the next couple of days.

Sarah Palin Using Son's Iraq Deployment for Sympathy Points, While Raising Safety Concerns Doing So (ABC 09/11/08 7:07am)
ROBIN ROBERTS: Governor Palin is in Alaska to attend a deployment ceremony for her son, private first class Track Palin, who's army infantry unit is heading to Iraq. In this election, the issue of the Iraq War a deeply personal one for both the Republican and the Democratic tickets.

JOHN BERMAN: Sarah Palin won't just be attending that, she'll be giving a speech and it will be open to television cameras. It's such a drastic difference from the way her own running mate, John McCain, handled his own sons deployment. And it's part of what makes this campaign so fascinating, three out of the four candidates have sons headed to Iraq or have been there already. Private first class Track Palin, Captain Beau Biden, both headed to Iraq in the next few weeks. Marine Lance Corporal Jimmy McCain has been there already. Jimmy's six month deployment came and went with hardly any public notice. Why? Because John McCain never mentioned it on the stump. Literally, never. That stands in stark contrast to what Governor Sarah Palin told more than 40 million viewers about her son during the Republican convention last week.

SARAH PALIN: One week from tomorrow, September 11th, he'll deploy to Iraq with the army infantry in the service of his country.

JOHN NAGL: It is the mark of an enthusiastic mother, I think, and a very proud mother. But it does impose, conceivably, some risks on the soldier and the unit.

BERMAN: There are no military restrictions about what family members can say about their kids. But many candidates say that they don't want to politicize service, and have held back on specifics like deployment dates because of safety concerns.

NAGL: There is always a risk when you talk about troop movements. There is a risk that terrorists could try to take advantage of the fact that they know when flights are leaving.

BERMAN: As for the children themselves, there are some rules. They're not supposed to discuss the details of their missions. Which explains Beau Biden's coded speech at the Democratic convention. Military officials and analysts tell us that Palin and Biden's kids will not get special treatment while overseas, but the one thing that will almost definitely change that is when someone wins the election. They say in this day in age the military would almost definitely have to take into account the child of a president, or a vice president in service.

As Palin Arrives Returns to Alaska She is Greeted By Cheering Fans and Screaming Mad Protesters (CNN 09/11/08 7:57am)
JESSICA YELLIN: An excited crowd of several thousand chanted Sarah! As the Governor's plane touched down to the soundtrack from the movie Top Gun. Palin gave the standard stump speech we've heard her give for the last week, but with a few tweaks. [...] Palin also skipped her lines boasting that she killed that bridge to nowhere, a topic that stirred some controversy around the nation and especially here in Alaska. Now folks we talked to who were there to support her say they like her because she's down to earth, she's a fighter. They think she took on oil companies on behalf of the little guy. Protesters outside though were carrying signs that said, "Sarah is a good old boy" and "Folks in Alaska know Sarah's not qualified to be V.P." So there's even some tension in Alaska over Palin's selection to be John McCain's running mate. Now Palin is in town to see her son attend a deployment ceremony today. He will ship off to Iraq in the next few weeks as part of the first striker brigade. All we can say about what he'll do there is that he will serve in northern Iraq.

Campaigning Together (CNN 09/11/08 8:08am)
DANA BASH: This morning you heard the fact that both candidates are suspending campaigning. […] He will actually have a pretty low key campaign week for the rest of the week. Why? Because they are pretty happy to leave the spotlight to Sarah Palin. Their final post-convention rally together and their biggest yet. With Sarah Palin, John McCain is well aware he's ignited a surprising fire for his campaign, and he's doing everything he can to stoke it. […] But McCain's advisers know Palin's record isn't what's making her a sensation. It's her persona, and they are scrambling to protect it. Assembling a new team of lawyers, researchers, and press aids to try to shape the onslaught of coverage. About everything from earmarks she fought for and against, to rampant rumor she banned books. Part of protecting Palin's image is trying to sully Barack Obama's, like with this new ad. […] Obama's campaign denied deploying anyone to dig up dirt. After their morning rally, McCain parted ways with Palin to campaign alone for the first time since picking her at a small round table with women at a Philadelphia diner. What a difference without Palin. Chanting outside, not for Sarah, but for Obama. McCain's statement to reporters, drowned out. He was finally forced to stop talking when his supporters got in the mix. All he could do was end with a joke. Now the stark difference between McCain's events with and without Palin is not lost on McCain's advisors. In fact, they say that when Palin returns from Alaska this weekend, she will finally have her first solo campaign trip to some battleground states. But they say to look for McCain and Palin together again soon. In fact, they say to look to them together a lot more between now and November then most running mates usually are.

Earmark Checking: Palin Camp Guilty of Big Bucks and Connections to Scandalous Lobbyists (CNN 09/11/08 6:45am)
BRIAN TODD: As all four candidates get into the back and forth of who can really change things in this town, we found that these four really run the gambit for genuine reform credentials, to old lying and power politics. The hot debate now, who will really change the way Washington does business. Both campaigns taking aim at an old staple of machine politics, those sometimes wasteful funding requests made by lawmakers, often for their home districts. John McCain's been a crusader against so called earmarks and he says his opponents asked for almost a billion dollars in pork barrel projects for his state in just less than four years in the US Senate. According to the non-partisan watchdog group, Taxpayers for Common Sense, Barack Obama has asked for nearly a billion dollars in earmarks during his Senate term. But the group gives him credit for disclosing his requests which most members of Congress don't do. Obama's made no requests for the next fiscal year, and even when he was asking for earmarks, he was far from the worst offender.

STEVE ELLIS: Just to put it into perspective, he got 98 million dollars worth of earmarks in fiscal year 2008. Senator Clinton got more than 300 million dollars in earmarks, and Senator Cochran, republican ranking member of the Appropriations Committee got more than 800 million dollars in earmarks.

TODD: Obama's running mate doesn't come close to that. But Joe Biden also has never disclosed what he's asked for, until this year. Biden's office says he's requesting about 300 million dollars. The Obama campaign points out that while McCain has never asked for earmarks, his running mate hardly has room to talk. […] According to state records and Taxpayers for Common Sense, Sarah Palin has asked for about $450 million dollars in Federal money since she became Governor. But she also gets some credit.

ELLIS: As Governor, she has by all records, started to reduce the number of earmark requests. So, it's a downward trajectory by our analysis. But still, significant earmark requests.

TODD: And Palin got into the earmarking early, before she even became Governor. According to state records and Tax Payers for Common Sense, she helped get about $27 million dollars, some of which went to the small Alaskan town of Wasilla during her second term as mayor there, from 1998 to 2002. The watchdog groups says one reason that Palin was able to get all that for her small town, she hired a lobbying firm run from a former staffer for Senator Ted Stevens, one of Washington's most legendary earmarkers.

Fact Checking Palin on Bridge to Nowhere and Library Book Banning, McCain on Fuel Efficiency Standards (CNN 09/11/08 7:14am)
JOHN ROBERTS: How bad have the false statements gotten on both sides of the political fence here?

BILL ADAIR: Boy it's really kicked into overdrive, especially since the conventions. That really seemed to be a turning point. We're at the point now where both campaigns are actually using our claims to justify opposing views. So, our truth-o-meter's been overheating lately.

ROBERTS: […] Sarah Palin, one of the big issues here is this bridge to nowhere, whether she supported it or didn't support it. […] We also heard her on the campaign trail during the gubernatorial campaign in 2006, apparently supporting the bridge. So where does the truth-o-meter come down on this idea of her being the person who killed the bridge?

ADAIR: Well, we gave it initially a, we gave the t.v. ad a "barely true," because it's important to recognize she initially supported the bridge when she was a candidate, and then opposed it. It's not like she boldly stood up and said, Congress I don't want the money, it was only after there was tremendous public opposition to it. So we gave the claim from the t.v. ad that she stopped it a "barely true", and on our flip-o-meter we gave her a full flop for flip-flopping on the issue.

ROBERTS: Because she had, as we said, during the 2006 gubernatorial campaign at least given it tacit support. She said that she wouldn't stand in the way of it, and then after she became governor said she was going to refuse the money for the bridge, though they still accepted the money, didn't they?

ADAIR: They did, and that's why we gave the ad a "barely true", because it's not like she stood up and said, no Congress, we won't take this, this is pork. She was very much in the culture of Alaska, which is accepting tons of public money for infrastructure like roads and things. So it's not the way it's been portrayed.

ROBERTS: A couple of things we got to get to quickly is, while there's an email circulating that Governor Palin tried to ban books from the Wasilla Public Library as mayor. Among those books, Huckleberry Finn and Harry Potter. What did you have to find about that?

ADAIR: We gave this one a "pants on fire" on our truth-o-meter, which is the lowest rating. This list is a complete fabrication, as you mentioned, the Harry Potter books were actually published after the incident occurred where she inquired about banning some books. So this one gets a "pants on fire".

ROBERTS: Ok, so she did not try to ban books as mayor of Wasilla. […] Obama has been attacking McCain's energy records, saying that McCain has said, no to higher fuel-efficiency standards for cars, no to investment in renewable energy, no to renewable fuels. True or untrue?

ADAIR: Specifically, the claim about fuel efficiency standards, we gave that one a "barely true", because McCain actually was a leader in trying to raise fuel efficiency standards and the Obama campaign has been sort of cherry picking there, picking votes where McCain voted against it, but ignoring the fact that he was a leader in another bill. So that one gets a "barely true". And I need to just point out something, you mentioned earlier about her not trying to ban books. That list is a fake, there are conflicting claims about what actually happened on the book banning. […] There was definitely a point where Mayor Palin raised the possibility of banning some books.

Begala Interviewed About 'Third Term'; Questioned About Lipstick Controversy, Poor Poll Numbers (NBC 09/11/08 7:05am)
MEREDITH VIEIRA: Paul Begala is a former strategist for Bill Clinton and an author. His latest book is a harsh critique of Senator John McCain. It's called Third Term: Why George W. Bush Loves John McCain. Paul, good morning to you.

PAUL BEGALA: Good morning. It's a love story.

VIEIRA: Yeah, exactly. We'll get into the love story in a second. You were in the war room in 1992 trying to get Bill Clinton elected to the Presidency. You know a lot about controversies. This lipstick on a pig, any long term repercussions or is this just another diversion.

BEGALA: Well it's a tactical diversion and that suggests-

VIEIRA: A smart one?

BEGALA: For the McCain camp, very smart, sure. They are, these campaigns have two totally different goals. The McCain campaign's job is to try to distract people from the fact that you know in the lives of most people the economy is going in the wrong direction, health care is going in the wrong direction, the whole country is going in the wrong direction. Oh wait look at this shiny object over here, you know, let's make a preposterous allegation of sexism because you use a common phrase. The Obama campaign's job is the opposite. They need to label that, set it aside, and say here's why they're doing it because they don't want you to remember for the last 8 years-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

VIEIRA: But Obama-

BEGALA: -they've run the country.

VIEIRA: -said lipstick, it must, the minute it came out of his mouth he must have thought geez, I probably shouldn't have even gone down this road.

BEGALA: Well, but see, you can't let them get into your head like that. You know, I just think this has been a frankly it's been in the news media seizing on it, great success for the McCain campaign. There are people in the McCain campaign every morning who get up and say, how do we distract people from the fact that two million folks are about to lose their homes, seven million have lost their health care? How do we distract from the fact that our guy votes with Bush 91% of the time. Oh I have a good idea, let's accuse Barack Obama of sexism. He was raised by a single mom, he must hate women. See, it's crazy.

VIEIRA: But you know they also may be thinking that happened during the primaries, Obama and his camp were accused of sexism by the Clintons. And with some people, that resonated. There are people that you know, Clinton supporters to this day believe that she was treated differently because she was a woman.

BEGALA: Yeah I think most of the complaints are with he media than with the candidate, than with Obama himself. I will note there was at least one really astonishing moment in the primaries when somebody went up to John McCain at a town hall meeting and used the b word to describe Senator Clinton. And he laughed and said good question. Now that was a time for him to show some real leadership so you know McCain has got very thin ice here he's skating on when he says the word lipstick is offensive but the b word he thinks is ok to Hillary Clinton?

VIEIRA: Let's talk about what Karl Rove said in the Wall St. Journal today because you actually brought it up. Of all the advantages Gov. Sarah Palin has brought to the GOP ticket, the most important may be that she has gotten into Barack Obama's head. Has she effectively gotten into his head?

BEGALA: Oh I think certainly into the campaign's head, who knows you know I don't want to pretend I can peer into Senator Obama's head itself. But yes, because there's this enormous distraction. This has been the benefit of picking someone who's never been vetted, who we have no idea about John McCain himself only met once. And I think it's actually a way that Bush has gotten into McCain's head. Just like Bush, John McCain goes rash, reckless, goes with his gut. You know, he didn't think this thing through. And, politically it's working out but I'd say governmentally, this is going to be really difficult I think for McCain to pull off.

VIEIRA: We also have a poll that particularly resonates today, on 9/11 the anniversary of 9/11. People were asked who they think would be a better commander in chief more straight forward, stronger leadership qualities, McCain on all of those. So, how does Obama turn that around?

BEGALA: A couple ways. I thought when Obama spoke in Denver, he was strong, he was clear, he went right at McCain on those questions. And then second, putting the last eight years on trial, asking people do you really feel safer, are we safer? You know, the Bush administration, with McCain support, I think has not made our ports safer, not our nuclear plants, they couldn't even protect us from Mexican jalapeños that flipped across the border in Texas and attacked our intestines. Okay, this is a crowd that has failed the last eight years, and I think Barack needs to that. Put Bush and McCain on trial. John McCain's running mate for Barack Obama should never be Sarah Palin, it should always be George W. Bush. He should tell the folks 91%, if your momma and my momma on election day realize that 91% of the time, McCain is wih Bush, Barack'll win.

VIEIRA: And very quickly on your book I want to make sure I plug this, but also you say it's a love story, you talk about the hug between Bush and McCain 2004 campaign, Bush's campaign was a defining moment for McCain's candidacy coming up and whom he is as a candidate. What do you mean?

BEGALA: He made a fundamental choice about his life and his career. He was going to be a Bush Republican. He'd been a very conservative Republican, and then for awhile when he ran for President he was pretty moderate. For about five minutes he was pro-choice. For literally one minute, during a commercial break he was for gay rights, gay marriage in fact even on Hardball, Chris Matthew's show, but he made that choice to hug Bush and he embraced him, he embraced his philosophy, we're seeing he's embraced his style of politics, and again that's the Obama campaign needs to do here. They need to make this a choice between the past and Bush and McCain and the future, Obama and Biden.

VIEIRA: Okay you look at our poll and again when you talk about change, his numbers are going up. McCain's are going up.

BEGALA: They are, they are, he's, McCain is doing his job, the question is has he done his job the last eight years supporting Bush all this time. Obama needs to do his job as well but we're only beginning to get into this. We're about 53 days to go and I think we aint see nothing yet.

VIEIRA: Alright Paul Begala thanks very much. If you'd like to read an excerpt from Third Term: Why George W. Bush Loves John McCain, you can find one at our website at todayshow.com

Blogger Comments On Palin Bashing, Her Popularity Domination Over McCain, and Wish for Flipped Ticket (FNC 09/11/08 7:59am)
STEVE DOOCY: […] Are the media going overboard with so called, PDS, Palin derangement syndrome?

MICHELLE MALKIN: […] I think PDS is rivaling Bush derangement syndrome in craziness. It's not just the blog-o-sphere, it's the entertainment industry. […] This is the full employment act for the internet, debunking all of the rumors and the smears, and these outbreaks. I mean, just most recently of course yesterday, you had Matt Damon and Roger Ebert, you've had Woopi Goldberg, all bashing Sarah Palin, questioning her parenthood abilities, going after her family. And you've got it on these big giant entertainment outlets as well. I've been following US Weekly and the backlash there, and they are hurting so badly guys, that they are begging people who are cancelling their subscriptions to stay on and promising to give them five extra free issues. So it really is ridiculous. And to tie this to September 11th, I just want to mention one particularly odious and vulgar person who has been bashing Sarah Palin. There was a comedian from Britain, Russell Brand, who hosted the MTV VMA's, this guy's idea of humor and the reason he came to fame in Britain was because he thought it would be funny to dress up as Osama Bin Laden the day after the 9/11 terrorist attacks. Ok? This is the guy that VIACOM and MTV hired to host the VMA's during the seventh anniversary of the week of 9/11.

BRIAN KILMEADE: Unbelievable, that's what VIACOM wants out there. […]

BRIAN KILMEADE: Hey, Senator McCain, I know you were slow to get on his bandwagon. Is he winning you over?

MALKIN: He's not. She is. And I think you're hearing that sentiment from the thousands of people who are showing up at these massive rallies, pictures of which you are not seeing on the front page of the New York Times or the Washington Post in the same way the slapped Obama's on there. But these voters are driving many hours to see these McCain-Palin rallies are going there to see Sarah Palin. She is the real star here. And there are a lot of folks among the conservative base that think the ticket really should be flipped.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Rally in Harrisburg, PA 10/21/08

Hello All,
Just got off the phone with our tracker, Lisa, on the ground in Harrisburg. Below are the notes from our call.

Big Highlights

- Continues to hit on Biden-Crisisgate-- Adds anecdote: Biden referred to how JFK was tested in Cuban missile crisis. i was involved in that, on board the USS Enterprise, we had a target. we came so close. america does not need a president who needs to be tested. i've been tested my friends
- On drilling, contrasts his approach with Obama's: we wont delay, "we wont consider," we will do it.
- Says Obama is picking his Cabinet -- Adds Barney Frank to the Obama-Pelosi-Reid triumverate of undesirables, accusing Frank of wanting to "redistribute the wealth"
- McCain continues hammering Obama for wanting to "spread the wealth" with another "phony tax cut ... government giveaway"

Harrisburg, PA: McCain Rally 10/21/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background details

- Cindy McCain intros McCain
    - TY for your kind support, generosity, your belief in my husband for all these months
    - when we decided to do this, we sat down as a fam -- it takes a fam to do this -- some of the most important reasons are b/t the mccain and palin fam, where we have 3 active duty kids serving-- jack in navy, jimmy in marine corps, and jack palin in the army -- it is b/c of those 3 men and your sons and daughters serving that i belive that my husband should be the next president -- his experience, his leadership and most of all his character, he would make the best president -- has served his country since he was 17 and since then he has always put country first [thank you john! thank you john!] -- he has inspired our kids and so many others around the world to serve causes greater than self interest, not just put campaign first but each other first
    - our camp stands for reform, peace and prosperity -- the only person in this race who truly knows to lead and who doesnt have to wait 60 days to learn how to do the job is john mccain
- 750 people, at capacity
- Tracker didn't see any demonstrators

Speech Highlights

TY TY now you see why they often say in AZ why isnt she the candidate? cindy's done great job for our campaign and as mother. and so proud to have sarah palin. TY Rep. Todd Platz, doing a great job as your Rep. and Sen. Jim Rhoades suffered a tragic accident (http://www.wnep.com/Global/story.asp?S=9200083) and our thoughts and prayers go out to him. id like to say how important and how happy i am to be here in PA - we need to win PA and we'll bring real change to DC- TY for this turnout and warmth and enthusiasm. in next 14 days we're gonna GOTV and win this. and you know, last wk it almost [yelling , McCain alaughs] it almost seemd like there were 3 candidates: obama me and JTP.

joe can claim achievement that few can top, only one to get straight answer out of obama about his plans for this country.

Now, Joe didn't ask for Senator Obama to come to his house, and he didn't ask to be famous. He certainly didn't ask for the political attacks on him from the Obama campaign. like so many americans, Joe's dream is to own a small business that will create jobs, and the attacks on him are an attack on small businesses all over the country. Small businesses employ 84 percent of Americans, and we need to support small businesses, not tax them the way obama wants to.

After months of campaign trail eloquence, we've finally learned what Senator Obama's economic goal is. As he told Joe, he wants to spread the wealth around. He believes in redistributing wealth, not in policies that grow our economy and create jobs and opportunities for all Americans. Senator Obama is more interested in controlling who gets your piece of the pie than he is in growing the pie. This explains some big problems with my opponent's claim that he will cut income taxes for 95 percent of Americans. You might ask: How do you cut income taxes for 95 percent of Americans, when more than 40 percent pay no income taxes right now? How do you reduce the number zero?

Well, that's the key to Barack Obama's whole plan: Since you can't reduce income taxes on those who pay zero, the government will write them all checks called a tax credit. And the Treasury will have to cover those checks by taxing other people, including a lot of folks just like Joe. In other words, Barack Obama's plan to raise taxes on some in order to give checks to others is not a tax cut; it's just another government giveaway. We have too much of that already.

The Obama tax increase would come at the worst possible time for America, and especially for small businesses like the one Joe dreams of owning. The small businesses Senator Obama would tax provide 16 million jobs in America. And a sudden tax hike for those businesses will kill jobs at a time when we need to be creating more jobs. I'm not going to let that happen.

America has an alternative to the phony tax cut my opponent started talking about only months ago. The McCain-Palin tax cut is the real thing. We're going to double the child deduction for every family. We will cut the capital gains tax. And we will cut business taxes to help create jobs, and keep American businesses in America.

As Joe has now reminded us all, America didn't become the greatest nation on earth by giving our money to the government to "spread the wealth around." In this country, we believe in spreading opportunity, for those who need jobs and those who create them. And that is exactly what I intend to do as President of the United States.

The next President won't have time to get used to the office. We face many challenges here at home, and many enemies abroad in this dangerous world. This weekend, Senator Biden guaranteed that if Senator Obama is elected, we will have an international crisis to test America's new President. We don't want a President who invites testing from the world at a time when our economy is in crisis and Americans are already fighting in two wars. Biden referred to how JFK was tested in Cuban missile crisis. i was involved in that, on board the USS Enterprise, we had a target. we came so close. america does not need a president who needs to be tested. i've been tested my friends. [USA! USA!]

What is more troubling is that Senator Biden told their campaign donors that when that crisis hits, they would have to stand with them because it wouldn't be apparent that Senator Obama would have the right response. Forget apparent. We know Senator Obama won't have the right response.

We've seen the wrong response from him over and over during this campaign. He opposed the surge strategy that is bringing us victory in Iraq and will bring us victory in Afghanistan. He said he would sit down unconditionally with the world's worst dictators. When Russia invaded Georgia, Sen. Obama said the invaded country should show restraint. He's been wrong on all of these. and btw, i will bring our troops home in honor and victory.

We cannot spend the next four years as we have spent much of the last eight: hoping for our luck to change at home and abroad. We have to act. We need a new direction, and we have to fight for it. I've been fighting for this country since I was seventeen years old, and I have the scars to prove it.

If I'm elected President, I will fight to shake up Washington and take America in a new direction from my first day in office until my last. I'm not afraid of the fight, I'm ready for it.

I'm not going to spend $750 billion dollars of your money just bailing out the Wall Street bankers and brokers who got us into this mess. I'm going to make sure we take care of the working people who were devastated by the excesses and greed of Wall Street and Washington.

my friends, home values home values. the subprime disgrace and crisis caused this.

I have a plan to protect the value of your home and get it rising again by buying up bad mortgages and refinancing them so if your neighbor defaults he doesn't bring down the value of your house with him. we've got to have americans keep their dreams of staying in their home and owning a home.

I have a plan to let retirees and people nearing retirement keep their money in their retirement accounts longer so they can rebuild their savings.

I have a plan to hold the line on taxes and cut them to make America more competitive and create jobs here at home. Raising taxes makes a bad economy much worse.

Keeping taxes low creates jobs, keeps money in your hands and strengthens our economy.

The explosion of government spending over the last eight years has put us deeper in debt to foreign countries that don't have our best interests at heart. It weakened the dollar and made everything you buy more expensive.

If I'm elected President, I won't spend nearly a trillion dollars more of your money. Senator Obama will. And he can't do that without raising your taxes or digging us further into debt. I'm going to make government live on a budget just like you do.

I will freeze government spending on all but the most important programs like defense, veterans care, Social Security and health care until we scrub every single government program and get rid of the ones that aren't working for the American people. And I will veto every single pork barrel bill Congresses passes.

If I'm elected President, I won't fine small businesses and families with children. Senator Obama will. He will force them into a new huge government run health care program, while he keeps the cost of the fine a secret until he hits you with it. I will bring down the skyrocketing cost of health care with competition and choice to lower your premiums, and make it more available to more Americans. I'll make sure you can keep the same health plan if you change jobs or leave a job to stay home.

I will provide every single American family with a $5000 refundable tax credit to help them purchase health care insurance. Workers who already have insurance from their employers will keep it and have more money to cover costs. Workers who don't have health insurance can use it to find a policy anywhere in this country to meet their basic needs.

If I'm elected President, I won't make it harder to sell our goods overseas and kill more jobs. Senator Obama will. I will open new markets to goods made in America and make sure our trade is free and fair. And I'll make sure we help workers who've lost a job that won't come back find a new one that won't go away.

Senator Obama wants to raise taxes and restrict trade. The last time America did that in a bad economy it led to the Great Depression. They say those who don't learn the lessons of history are doomed to repeat them. Well, my friends, I know my history lessons, and I won't make the mistakes Senator Obama seeks to repeat.

If I'm elected President, we're going to stop sending $700 billion to countries that don't like us very much.

in the debate we had the other night -- i think it went pretty well -- you have to admire his eloquence, but you have to listen to his words. he said he would quote "consider" offshore drilling. consider. we wont delay, wont consider, we will do it. [drill baby drill!] he'll argue to delay drilling for more oil and gas and against building new nuclear power plants in America. If I am president, we will start new drilling now. We will invest in all energy alternatives -- nuclear, wind, solar, and tide. We will encourage the manufacture of hybrid, flex fuel and electric automobiles. We will invest in clean coal technology that can turn the economy of this state around. USA is sitting on world's largest supply of coal. Clean coal tech will reduce greenhouse emissions, itll save money. We will lower the cost of energy within months, and we will create millions of new jobs.

Let me give you the state of the race today. We have 14 days to go. We're a few points down. The national media has written us off.

Just the other day, Senator Obama's campaign announced that he is choosing his cabinet. He's measuring the drapes, and planning with Speaker Pelosi and Senator Reid to raise taxes, increase spending. Just last night, Barney Frank [boos], one of the most powerful members of Congress, said guess what, he wants to raise taxes and redistribute the wealth. and pelosi and reid want to concede defeat in Iraq, i will never do that. But they forgot to let you decide. My friends, as we've said several times in the past, we've got them just where we want them.

What America needs in this hour is a fighter; someone who puts all his cards on the table and trusts the judgment of the American people. I have fought for you most of my life. There are other ways to love this country, but I've never been the kind to do it from the sidelines.

I know you're worried. America is a great country, but we are at a moment of national crisis that will determine our future. Will we continue to lead the world's economies or will we be overtaken? Will the world become safer or more dangerous? Will our military remain the strongest in the world? Will our children and grandchildren's future be brighter than ours?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

My answer to you is yes. Yes, we will lead. Yes, we will prosper. Yes, we will be safer. Yes, we will pass on to our children a stronger, better country. But we must be prepared to act swiftly, boldly, with courage and wisdom.

I'm an American. And I choose to fight. Don't give up hope. Be strong. Have courage. And fight.

Fight for a new direction for our country. Fight for what's right for America.

Fight to clean up the mess of corruption, infighting and selfishness in Washington.

Fight to get our economy out of the ditch and back in the lead.

Fight for the ideals and character of a free people.

Fight for our children's future.

Fight for justice and opportunity for all.

Stand up to defend our country from its enemies.

Stand up, stand up, stand up and fight. America is worth fighting for. Nothing is inevitable here. We never give up. We never quit. We never hide from history. We make history.

Now, let's go win this election and get this country moving again.

TY and god bless!

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"I have asked Hermes to debaptize the Birkin Croco" — Jane Birkin. The actress wants her name removed from Birkin bags made with crocodile skin. She's not happy with how the animals are killed to make the bags. Leading many to wonder how one debaptizes a handbag.

SKIMM THIS

SPY

THE STORY

Yesterday, Jonathan Pollard — a convicted spy for Israel — was granted parole after 30 years behind bars.

WHY IS EVERYONE TALKING ABOUT THIS?

It's been a controversial issue since he was sentenced to life in prison in 1987. Pollard, who worked for the US Navy, pleaded guilty to giving classified docs to Israel. His supporters, including Israel, said the sentence was too harsh and have been fighting for decades to get him released. The US always said 'nope'…until yesterday, when it was announced Pollard would be freed from prison this November.

WHAT CHANGED?

Some think this has something to do with a little thing called the Iran nuclear deal – which Israel is not on board with. Releasing Pollard could be the US trying to smooth things over with Israel. But the US says the two issues aren't connected.

theSKIMM

The US and Israel's friendship has had some awkward moments recently, and the release of Pollard could ease some of the tension.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU WAKE UP TO A FULL INBOX...

Overwhelmed. The Eurotunnel knows this problem well. You know it as where the Eurostar runs, or the Chunnel, or the easy way to get from France to Britain. #AbroadProblems. Yesterday in France, more than 2 ,0 00 migrants – many from Africa and the Mideast – tried to storm the tunnel's entrance to get into Britain. This is the second night in a row this has happened. One man was killed, likely by a truck, and the others were blocked by police. For months, thousands of these migrants have been camped out near the tunnel trying to make a move. That's because the Brits have a rep for being more generous with asylum than the French, and for having more job opportunities for low-wage and illegal workers. Refresher: Africa and the Mideast have been more of a mess than usual lately. That's made a lot of people desperate to leave and seek asylum in Western countries. Europe has been trying to figure out how to deal with a huge increase in migrants coming from these areas. Britain and France have been blaming each other for failing to deal with this crisis. Good job, team.

WHAT TO SAY TO YOUR FRIEND WHO'S ALREADY PLANNING A FOOTBALL KICKOFF PARTY...

Don't hold your breath for Tom's RSVP. Yesterday, the NFL upheld New England Patriots QB Tom Brady's four-game suspension for his role in Deflategate. Deflategate: when the Patriots were accused of intentionally deflating game balls to make them easier to grip. Because size matters. Brady's always claimed he knew nothing about this case of shrunken balls syndrome. But then a few months ago, the NFL released a report that said Brady probably knew about it, citing texts between two Pats employees who allegedly did the deed. Problem is, the NFL couldn't see the texts on Brady's phone. Yesterday, it came out that he had the phone destroyed, and the 10,000 texts that could've easily been accessed from it. Next level digital detox.

Can we get info from the foundation about how much they spend on programs? Would be good to remind people in more concrete terms - even on background - about the work of the foundation - speaking fees aside; the money the foundation raises has literally changed lives. Heard about it throughout a trip to Ghana a few years ago and was there with another organization.

FIRST READ: GOP PRESIDENTIAL HOPEFULS MOSTLY SILENT ON DRONE MISTAKE

First Read is a morning briefing from Meet the Press and the NBC Political Unit on the day's most important political stories and why they matter.

The Sound of Silence (Almost) From the '16 Candidates on Drone Deaths

If you've been following American politics over the last six years, President Obama could sneeze, and it would produce a flurry of negative statements and reactions from his political opponents. That's what makes yesterday's silence -- or backtracking -- from Republican 2016 presidential candidates regarding the accidental drone killing of two hostages so striking. As the Wall Street Journal writes, some Republican 2016ers chose not to comment on yesterday's news (Jeb Bush, Scott Walker), while two others who staged a 2013 filibuster against U.S. drone policy had no stomach to protest it (Rand Paul and Ted Cruz). "It is a tragedy that these hostages lost their lives," Paul said in a brief statement, per the Journal. "My prayers and thoughts are with their families." Cruz called for investigation into the deaths, but added: "Make no mistake: responsibility for their deaths lies firmly and unequivocally with the terrorists who kidnapped them and forcibly held them in their command center."

But it's a conversation and debate worth having

Meanwhile, Lindsey Graham -- a hawkish supporter of U.S. intervention overseas -- said, "Collateral damage is part of war. I've got no problem at all with anything that happened, other than my deepest sympathies for those who were held by al Qaeda that became collateral damage." And Marco Rubio added, "We are all safer because of the actions taken every day around the world by our government to go after those who wish Americans harm and to prevent future attacks against us here at home." But what's amazing is that an issue that sparks so much political debate -- Should drones be used in these kinds of operations? What about against American citizens, even those with al Qaeda ties? Should there be more checks and balances? -- the 2016ers essentially punted. These are ALL questions American voters should get answers from the people vying to become the next commander-in-chief. But no one was comfortable having that conversation yesterday. It's a reminder of just how unprepared many of these campaigns are to debate some of the true heavy issues out there.

The Clinton campaign strikes back

Hours after the New York Times reported on a Canadian mining company -- whose principals donated heavily to the Clinton Foundation over the years -- sold its uranium business to Russia (which had to be approved by Hillary Clinton's State Department), the Clinton campaign struck back at the newspaper. It issued these rebuttals to attempt to knock down any quid-pro-quo:

1. Hillary wasn't involved in the State Department's review; it is the assistant secretary of state for economic, energy, and business affairs who makes the call;
2. The main Clinton Foundation donor, Frank Giustra, sold his stake in the Canadian mine business in 2007, so before Hillary became secretary of state;
3. The State Department was one of nine U.S. agencies to review the sale.

Indeed, upon reflection, that Times article doesn't hold up that well 24 hours after its publication. But if there's a legitimate criticism of the Clintons here -- especially when it comes to the other articles about the Clinton Foundation and Bill's speaking fees (here and here) -- it's that they were sloppy, bordering on being greedy. As Jonathan Chait writes . "All sorts of unproven worst-case-scenario questions float around the web of connections between Bill's private work, Hillary Clinton's public role as secretary of State, the Clintons' quasi-public charity... But the best-case scenario is bad enough: The Clintons have been disorganized and greedy." Just a reminder: Going after the Clintons on personal money and appearances of conflict of interest was a successful message for candidate Barack Obama in 2007-2008.

Why Ted Cruz skipped the Loretta Lynch vote

He had to catch a flight to a Texas fundraiser: Ted Cruz, who was one of the most vocal critics against Loretta Lynch's nomination for Attorney General, was the only senator to miss her final confirmation vote today because he needed to catch a flight for a previously scheduled commitment in Texas, his campaign told NBC's Kelly O'Donnell and Frank Thorp. "He had to catch a flight for a commitment in Texas," Cruz campaign spokeswoman Catherine Frazier said. According to a fundraising invite obtained by Real Clear Politics , Cruz has a fundraiser in Dallas, TX scheduled for 6:00 pm. Cruz spoke on the Senate floor Thursday morning against Lynch's nomination, and then voted against the procedural vote to move forward with consideration of her nomination, something called "cloture." But Cruz missed the actual vote on Lynch's nomination.

"John Kasich should be punished for expanding Obamacare": Here's a reason you might not want to buy stock in John Kasich's POSSIBLE presidential candidacy: He expanded Medicaid in Ohio. And here's the headline from the Washington Examiner's Philip Klein , one of top conservative wonks: "John Kasich should be punished for expanding Obamacare."

Saturday's two GOP cattle calls

Saturday brings two GOP cattle calls. One is the Iowa Faith & Freedom Coalition spring kick-off, featuring nine 2016ers -- Cruz, Fiorina, Huckabee, Jindal, Paul, Perry, Rubio, Santorum, and Walker. And the other one is the Republican Jewish Coalition confab in Las Vegas, which will also hear from Cruz and Perry, as well as George W. Bush, John Boehner, and Mitt Romney.

FIRST READ: MONEY-IN-POLITICS STORIES TO WATCH FOR 2016

First Read is a morning briefing from Meet the Press and the NBC Political Unit on the day's most important political stories and why they matter.

Two other money-in-politics stories to watch in the 2016 race

With all the attention on the Clinton Foundation story -- and with its potential conflicts of interest (see our piece on it yesterday) -- there are two other money-in-politics that should be on everyone's radar screens:

1. The Koch and Adelson Primaries: On Monday, the NYT reported that the Koch Brothers had settled on their preferred 2016 candidate - Scott Walker. Then Koch World pushed back on that story, saying they are still holding auditions for their favorite 2016 candidate. But here is a key question: If the Koch Brothers (and their network of wealthy donors) are going to dole out millions and millions of dollars and they're currently auditioning candidates, what are they getting in return for that support? Check out this quote from Charles Koch: "We're telling [GOP candidates] that if they want our support, one way to get it is articulating a good message to help Americans get a better understanding and a better appreciation of how certain policies ... will benefit them and will benefit all America." What policies are those? Here's NBC's Leigh Ann Caldwell on Scott Walker's ties to the Koch Brothers.

And it's just not the Koch Primary. This coming Saturday, at least two Republican presidential contenders -- Ted Cruz and Rick Perry -- are going to Las Vegas to speak at the Sheldon Adelson-backed Republican Jewish Coalition confab. In the 2012 cycle, Adelson and his wife donated nearly $100 million to GOP outside groups, including Super PACs supporting Newt Gingrich and Mitt Romney.

2. Jeb Bush in uncharted Super PAC waters: On Tuesday, the AP reported that Jeb Bush plans to outsource his TV ads, direct mail, and data gathering to his Super PAC, Right to Rise. What's noteworthy here is that, according to campaign-finance laws, there is supposed to be NO coordination between a candidate and a Super PAC. But Jeb Bush is exploiting a loophole -- and potentially violating at least the SPIRIT of these laws -- because he's not officially a presidential candidate. So he's raising money for this Super PAC and putting his key personnel there. The moment he declares his candidacy (in June?), he'll stop his role with the Super PAC. But by then, it will have all the money (through unlimited donations) and infrastructure it needs.

Bank on it: The Super PACs will outspend the campaigns -- at least during the primary season

When it comes to Jeb Bush's Super PAC, maybe the biggest consequence of it is that, in 2016, we're going to see the Super PACs outspend the actual campaigns, at least during the primary season. As the New York Times' Nick Confessore points out, the Romney campaign spent about $76 million in the 2012 primary season, while the main pro-Romney Super PAC spent $49 million. As Confessore mused, it's easy to see how that ratio shifts for Jeb Bush -- and perhaps the other GOP candidates as well.

Obama visits Florida Everglades to mark Earth Day

USA Today : "President Obama spends Earth Day on Wednesday in the Florida Everglades, promoting his climate change policies. After touring Everglades National Park in the afternoon, Obama will speak 'on the threat that climate change poses to our economy and to the world,' says the White House schedule. The president will stress his efforts to reduce carbon emissions, while criticizing congressional Republicans for opposing his environmental policies." Obama delivers his remarks at 3:55 pm ET.

Hillary vague on trade deal

Turning back to the 2016 race, Hillary Clinton was incredibly vague when talking about the political fight over the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) trade deal. "Any trade deal has to produce jobs and raise wages and increase prosperity and protect our security," she said in New Hampshire yesterday. "And we need to do our part to make sure we have the capacity and the skills to be competitive." As we've written before, this trade deal -- as well as a battle over "fast-track" trade authority for President Obama -- puts Hillary in a tough spot. Does she back Obama and her husband Bill? Or does she side with organized labor, as well as the likes of Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders, who have come out against it? Other questions: Will Hillary be able to look credible if she opposes the TPP? Would it add to a perception she'll say or do anything? Could the better position for her actually be supporting it, showing that she's willing to buck her base (especially since Obama is for it)? Also on the trade-deal front, here's a Wall Street Journal op-ed by Paul Ryan and Ted Cruz supporting giving Obama fast-track authority.

Walker comes out against LEGAL immigration?

Don't miss this piece by MSNBC's Benjy Sarlin : "Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker's newfound skepticism of legal immigration levels is a potential turning point in the still nascent presidential race, potentially dragging the Republican Party further to the right than Mitt Romney's hardline immigration platform in 2012. 'In terms of legal immigration, how we need to approach that going forward is saying - the next president and the next Congress need to make decisions about a legal immigration system that's based on, first and foremost, on protecting American workers and American wages,' Walker said Monday in an interview with Glenn Beck. 'It is a fundamentally lost issue by many in elected positions today - what is this doing for American workers looking for jobs, what is this doing to wages, and we need to have that be at the forefront of our discussion going forward.'" A Walker spokeswoman told the Washington Examiner's Philip Klein: "Gov. Walker supports American workers' wages and the U.S. economy and thinks both should be considered when crafting a policy for legal immigration. He strongly supports legal immigration, and like many Americans, believes that our economic situation should be considered instead of arbitrary caps on the amount of immigrants that can enter."

FIRST READ'S MORNING CLIPS

OBAMA AGENDA: The latest in Yemen

The New York Times : "Warplanes from a Saudi-led military coalition conducted airstrikes in the southwestern Yemeni city of Taiz on Wednesday, hours after Saudi officials had announced they were halting their nearly monthlong bombing campaign against the Houthi rebel movement. The warplanes bombed Houthi positions during heavy clashes in Taiz on Wednesday morning, according to a local official in the city. The new airstrikes, combined with reports of continued fighting in other parts of the country, including the southern port city of Aden, dampened hopes that the Saudi announcement would quickly result in a broader cease-fire."

Obama is headed to Florida - the home state of two GOP presidential hopefuls - to talk climate change.

DEA chief Michele Leonhart is stepping down amid disagreements with the Obama administration and criticism of her handling of a scandal.

The Baltimore Sun has the latest on the DOJ probe of Freddie Gray's death.

CONGRESS: The deal that paved the way for Loretta Lynch's nomination

NBC's Frank Thorp reports on the deal that paved the way for a vote on Loretta Lynch's nomination this week.

National Journal first reported last night that Mitch McConnell is introducing a bill to reauthorize the surveillance authority of the Patriot Act until 2020.

Rep. Ken Buck of Colorado has an AR-15 in his office, exempt from D.C. law because of his status as a congressman, reports the Washington Post.

Kate Snow writes about Rep. Mike Honda's 8-year-old granddaughter, who is transgender.

OFF TO THE RACES: The Koch Brothers' Five Favorites

USA Today reports that the Koch brothers have identified five candidates that they could consider backing: Walker, Bush, Cruz, Paul and Rubio.

Writes the Des Moines Register : "Hot-button issues such as clean power, water quality regulations and renewable fuels are expected to get a bigger stage in the 2016 Iowa Caucuses, as environmental activists put more pressure on presidential contenders to address controversial issues such as climate change."

CLINTON: From the Associated Press , on Bill Clinton's role: "Aides say the ex-president will stay behind the scenes initially and that Hillary Clinton's focus on her parents and grandchild allow her to fill in other aspects of her biography. Invoking Bill Clinton, who has high approval ratings, also can bring up positives from his administration, such as a strong economy, but at the risk of revisiting the Monica Lewinsky scandal and subsequent impeachment drama."

The Washington Post writes about how Clinton's trade comments are kicking off a public intra-party trade war.

The Huffington Post reports that top campaign officials have a goal of $100 million for the Democratic primary race.

POLITICO describes her as "unrunning" for president.

Bloomberg writes that the findings of the House Benghazi probe likely won't be released until next year.

FIRST READ: WHAT YOU NEED TO KNOW ABOUT THE CLINTON FOUNDATION STORY

First Read is a morning briefing from Meet the Press and the NBC Political Unit on the day's most important political stories and why they matter.

Everything you wanted to know about the Clinton Foundation-money story but were afraid to ask

With the Clinton Foundation's fundraising practices once again in the news as Hillary Clinton runs for president -- especially with a new controversial book on the subject -- here are the basics of what you need to know:

- ORIGINAL CONCERN ABOUT CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

At Hillary Clinton's Jan. 13, 2009 confirmation hearing to be secretary of state, then-Sen. Dick Lugar (R-IN) summed up the potential conflict of interest between the Clinton Foundation receiving donations from foreign countries and Clinton's new job. "The core of the problem is that foreign governments and entities may perceive the Clinton Foundation as a means to gain favor with the secretary of state. Although neither Senator Clinton nor President Clinton has a personal financial stake in the foundation, obviously its work benefits their legacy and their public service priorities."

Hillary Clinton agreed about the perception problem. "[T]he foundation and the president-elect decided to go beyond what the law and the ethics rules call for to address even the appearance of conflict and that is why they signed a memorandum of understanding, which outlines the voluntary steps that the foundation is taking to address potential concerns that might come up down the road."

- THE MEMO OF UNDERSTANDING

The "Memo of Understanding" that Hillary Clinton reached with the Obama administration had two main objectives:

-- to prohibit President Clinton from soliciting funds or accepting foreign-government contributions to the Clinton Global Initiative (CGI);

-- to disclose foreign countries that INCREASED their commitments to all Clinton Foundation entities, or that became a NEW contributor

(The memo of understanding was signed by Valerie Jarrett and Bruce Lindsey of the Clinton Foundation. It also was under supervision by John Kerry and Dick Lugar of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- THE 2010 ALGERIA DONATION

In Feb. 2015, we learned that the Clinton Foundation FAILED TO DISCLOSE a $500,000 donation in 2010 to assist with earthquake relief in Haiti. This was a NEW donation, and thus should have been disclosed to the State Department.

The Clinton Foundation issued a statement saying that the donation SHOULD have been disclosed. "Immediately following the devastating earthquake in Haiti on January 12, 2010, the Embassy of Algeria made an unsolicited donation of $500K to Clinton Foundation Haiti Relief fund. As the Clinton Foundation did with all donations it received for earthquake relief, the entire amount of Algeria's contribution was distributed as aid in Haiti. This donation was disclosed publicly on our website, however, the State Department should have also been formally informed. This was a one-time, specific donation to help Haiti and Algeria had not donated to the Clinton Foundation before and has not since."

- CURRENT POLICY NOW THAT THE CLINTON CAMPAIGN IS UNDERWAY

The Clinton Foundation is no longer accepting new donations from foreign governments. But it is still CONTINUING existing programs that were up and running before Hillary began her campaign. There are six countries that had EXISTING programs -- Australia, Canada, Germany, the Netherlands, Norway, and the U.K. As a Clinton Foundation official tells NBC News, "You just can't pull the plug" on existing programs, especially when they involve multi-year grants.

Also under current policy, all disclosures will be listed quarterly instead of yearly (as was the case under the older Memo of Understanding). And after the Clinton Global Initiative completes its already-planned Morocco conference, it will no longer have foreign countries sponsor or co-sponsor CGI events.

Hillary's Day 2 in New Hampshire

Hillary Clinton has a 10:20 am ET event in Concord, NH, where she'll focus on community college programs.

On the trail

Chris Christie speaks at the Washington Conference on the Americas at 12:25 pm ET... Carly Fiorina has events in Council Bluffs, Sioux City and Denison, IA... And former President Bill Clinton gives an address on public service at Georgetown University at 10:30 am ET.

A breakthrough on Loretta Lynch and the anti-trafficking bill?

It looks that way. Politico : "The Senate is nearing a resolution to a monthlong dispute that's halted a human trafficking bill and confirmation of attorney general nominee Loretta Lynch, even as Minority Leader Harry Reid on Monday resumed his rhetorical assault on Republicans for the delay." More: "Top sources in both parties - and even Reid himself - said negotiators had made headway toward a compromise on abortion language included in the sex trafficking bill that Democrats have strongly opposed. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has vowed that the trafficking bill must be completed before the Senate votes to confirm Lynch."

Yet ANOTHER Republican says no to running for FL SEN

This is getting weirder and weirder. "Two weeks after floating the idea of a 2016 run for U.S. Senate, Rep. Tom Rooney, R-Okeechobee, said today he has decided against seeking the seat Sen. Marco Rubio is giving up to run for president," the Palm Beach Post writes . "'For the last several days I considered running for the U.S. Senate representing the great state of Florida. While I feel like I could mount a successful statewide campaign, the toll I believe the process would take on my family is something I cannot put them through,' Rooney said in a statement released by his office."

FIRST READ'S MORNING CLIPS

OFF TO THE RACES: Jeb to rely heavily on Super PAC

BUSH: The AP reports that he will delegate a lot of his campaign tasks - like advertising, direct mail, and data gathering - to his Super PAC. More: "The architects of the plan believe the super PAC's ability to legally raise unlimited amounts of money outweighs its primary disadvantage, that it cannot legally coordinate its actions with Bush or his would-be campaign staff."

CHRISTIE: More bad news for the NJ gov, from the Washington Post : "New Jersey state Sen. Joseph M. Kyrillos, who chaired Christie's 2009 gubernatorial campaign and ushered his agenda through a Democratic-controlled legislature, is backing former Florida governor Jeb Bush's all-but-certain presidential bid."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He has hired an Iowa political director for his PAC, reports the Des Moines Register.

Bloomberg writes that Christie is hoping (again) to jumpstart his flagging presidential hopes with a speech in DC.

CLINTON: The New York Times digs into how Hillary Clinton is working to embrace Elizabeth Warren's populist rhetoric. And/but: "Nothing stings her inner circle more than the suggestion that their candidate is late to these issues. Mrs. Clinton was the original Elizabeth Warren, her advisers say, a populist fighter who for decades has been an advocate for families and children; only now have the party and primary voters caught up."

The Wall Street Journal writes on how Mayor Rahm Emanuel's run-off victory in Chicago could provide lessons for Clinton.

Yesterday in New Hampshire, she said she's "ready" for Republican attacks.

WMUR previews her community college pitch today.

WALKER: The New York Times writes that David Koch has been indicating that Scott Walker is his favorite Republican candidate.

And around the country...

FLORIDA: Republican Tom Rooney says he won't seek Marco Rubio's Senate seat.

NEVADA: Gov. Brian Sandoval is confusing some folks in his own party, writes the Wall Street Journal.

VIRGINIA: Former First Lady Maureen McDonnell is hoping to get her public corruption convictions tossed out.

OBAMA AGENDA: Deploying the USS Theodore Roosevelt

From the AP : "In a stepped-up response to Iranian backing of Shiite rebels in Yemen, the Navy aircraft carrier USS Theodore Roosevelt is steaming toward the waters off Yemen to beef up security and join other American ships that are prepared to intercept any Iranian vessels carrying weapons to the Houthi rebels."

An Egyptian court has sentenced former president Mohammed Morsi to 20 years in prison for charges of inciting violence.

The Baltimore Sun has the latest on the death of Freddie Gray, a 25 year-old black man who suffered a spinal injury while in police custody.

CONGRESS: Business vs. Labor on trade

The Hill writes that business and labor groups are back in their corners as they battle over trade legislation.

The New York Times writes that Congress is pushing forward on Obama's agenda, even as the Hill is now dominated by the GOP.

It's still not clear when Loretta Lynch will get her confirmation vote.

John McCain and Ted Cruz are in a bit of a dust-up over the possibility of hearings on troops carrying personal firearms on military installations.

It looks like Capitol Police Chief Kim Dine is staying on after all, Roll Call reports.

Dear Friends,

We thought you might be interested in our letter (below) to over 50 top American policymakers who can affect policy toward Greece. We took the opportunity of a US government blunder to remind these officials of Greece's often-overlooked importance to America.

Dear _____,

As you know, for over five decades and three generations, our family has worked to make bilateral relations with Greece optimal for America. It is in this vein that we bring to the attention of friends like you a potentially serious consequence of our officials' recent unwise treatment of the people of Greece.

At this pivotal juncture in Greek history, some economically devastated and fragile Greeks have been seeking a dramatic departure from the status quo and flirting with Russian President Vladimir Putin. Some Greeks have questioned why their country never sees the benefits of using American access to their important military base in Souda Bay, Crete as a strategic card of negotiation, as Turkey always does with their Incirlik base.

Such sentiment could approach reality following the imminent results of negotiations on the German-led economic bailout of Greece. The anticipated difficult situation could lead to yet another election. Such an election could produce a coalition government with much less favorable views about issues crucial to American security interests.

Amid this situation where many Greeks see German efforts as attempts to "humiliate" their injured country, our officials took an action seen by some Greeks as additional "humiliation." Secretary of Defense Ashton Carter recently invited the Greek people's Minister of Defense to Washington and then bizarrely refused to meet with him. He refused even a face-saving photo op or phone call, despite the invitation emerging from his office in the first place. Headlines in Greece shouted:

- "AN UNPRECEDENTED CHILLING FROM THE US",
- "COLD SHOWER FOR THE GREEK SIDE FROM WASHINGTON'S DECISION",
- "CLOSED DOOR BY AMERICAN SECRETARY OF DEFENSE, CANCELLED THE MEETING".

This strange decision, though possibly satisfying some short-term goal, seems to have gone out of its way to send a dangerous message to the people of Greece. It could very well have a long-term negative impact on American interests in the region and on our incredibly positive historic relationship. These, after all, are the Greek people: (1) whose Souda Bay base has been crucial to thousands of our planes, ships and troops fighting in Afghanistan, Iraq, Syria and elsewhere in the Middle East; (2) who are our outpost of Western Democracy (with only Israel and Cyprus) in that rapidly retrogressing region; (3) who make up the country that was one of only seven that has been with us in every international conflict in the 20th Century; and (4) who were the first to defeat the Axis Forces in WWII, publicly oppose the Holocaust while occupied by Nazis and who Winston Churchill said were crucial to the defeat of Hitler.

Although probably unrelated to this meeting cancellation, just days later, the Greek Prime Minister began discussions with President Putin regarding plans for possible energy and economic cooperation between Russia and cash-strapped Greece. However, should another Greek election materialize with more Greek votes cast against America's interests, it could be related.

We should always treat the Greek people as the great allies they are. However, this should especially be the case during this era when: (1) we have spent virtually nothing to help our great ally's brutal economic catastrophe, while sending hundreds of millions elsewhere (like the tens of millions we give every year to Caribbean private businesses); and (2) American military efforts against the greatest threats on American lives emanating from the Eastern Mediterranean are dependent on Greece's Souda Bay's base. We ask that you, as a friend of Greece, urge others in the Administration to deal appropriately with our Greek allies.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sincerely,

Andy Manatos Mike Manatos

Scotland on the Eve of the Independence Referendum

On September 18th, Scottish voters will decide whether their country will be the first to secede from a Western-European state in recent history. After two years of campaigning it would seem that politicians, academics, and journalists would have a good understanding of the public sentiment. Using very recent data from the only large-scale, representative, and comprehensive attitudes surveys in Scotland, however, this talk will highlight where the general "wisdom" about Scots' attitudes towards the referendum may be empirically wrong. After showing where the polls stand and what we may expect as polling day approaches, this talk will focus in particular on how the attitudes of Scottish people towards international affairs have often been misrepresented, in particular in relation to the European Union, Scotland's role in the world, and nuclear weapons in Scotland. The talk will identify issues that may still move people, in either direction, before casting their vote.

3 Israelis Critically Wounded in Stabbing Attack in Jerusalem

Three Israelis were wounded, two seriously and one critically, in a stabbing attack in Jerusalem on Wednesday afternoon, Hebrew media outlets reported. According to initial reports, two Palestinian men went on a rampage, attempting to murder as many passersby as possible near the Jaffa Gate of the Old City. One of the victims purportedly tackled his assailant and struggled with him for some minutes, as he was being stabbed. A Border Policewoman opened fire on the terrorists, killing one of them and wounding the other. An investigation is underway to determine whether one of the Israeli victims was actually wounded by bullets aimed at the terrorists.

Hamas Terror Cell Planning Suicide Bombings Busted

The Israeli Security Agency (ISA) cleared for publication on Wednesday that it has nabbed a Hamas terror cell located in Abu Dis, just adjacent to Jerusalem to the East, that was planning to launch suicide and car bombing attacks. The arrests took place in recent weeks, and saw a wide terror infrastructure that was directed by Hamas terrorists in Gaza exposed. Up to now a full 25 Hamas activists in the terror cell have been arrested, most of them students of Abu Dis University. From the investigation it has been learned the leader of the cell was 24-year-old Ahmed Gamal Mussa Azzam, a resident of Kalkilya in northern Jerusalem.

No Justice for Duma Terrorists Risks "Setting Region on Fire"

Failure to bring Jewish extremists behind the Duma arson attack to justice would risk "setting the region on fire," Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon warned Tuesday. "They could carry out additional terrorist acts and murder innocents, setting the region on fire," he said. "We are obligated to fight these terrorist activities. They violate our values and they are dangerous to us all." The defense minister vehemently rejected allegations of abuse and torture leveled against the Shin Bet (Israel Security Agency) in its investigation and attempts to track down those responsible for the July murder of Palestinian parents and their toddler son.

Turkey Expels Hamas Leader, Ties w/ Israel Still in Balance

Turkey has expelled senior Hamas official Saleh al-Aruri, as a step towards an agreement to normalize relations with Israel, but the deal reportedly remains some way from being finalized. A meeting took place last week between Turkish official Feridun Sinirlioglu and Israeli envoy Joseph Ciechanover alongside National Security Advisor Yossi Cohen. They agreed an outline of measures to restore diplomatic relations after a five-year hiatus. These include Israel's payment of £13.3 million to compensate families of Turkish citizens hurt during Mavi Marmara. Meanwhile, Turkey will pass legislation to drop cases against IDF personnel, which precipitated the end of diplomatic ties.

Israeli Embassy Trolls White House with Settlement-Only Gifts

This year's holiday gifts from the Israeli embassy come with a politically charged message: the occupied Palestinian territories are part of Israel. Israel's ambassador to the US, Ron Dermer, tweeted on Monday that all of the presents he is sending this holiday season will be products produced in the occupied West Bank and Golan Heights. The gifts will include wine, olive oil, body cream, and halva, the Israeli embassy told The Huffington Post. In a letter to gift recipients, Dermer described his decision as an effort to "combat the latest effort by Israel's enemies to destroy the one and only Jewish state," specifically referencing the EU decision to label goods originating in the occupied Palestinian territories to distinguish them from products made within Israel's 1967 borders.

Three Days After Kuntar's Death, Putin and Bibi Speak on Syria

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Russian President Vladimir Putin discussed the situation in Syria on the phone on Tuesday. The phone call by Putin to Netanyahu took place three days after Lebanese terrorist Samir Kuntar was killed in Syria in an aerial strike, which was attributed to Israel. The Kremlin and the Prime Minister's Office released almost identical statements after the conversation. The two leaders agreed the continue dialogue at various levels, including coordination in the war against terrorism between the two countries, as well as in other regional matters.

State Dept. Rejects Lawmakers' Call to Close PLO's DC Office

The US State Department on Tuesday rejected calls by 32 congressional lawmakers, including Republican presidential candidate Ted Cruz, to close the Washington office of the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO). In a letter, lawmakers called on Secretary of State John Kerry to revoke a waiver that allowing PLO office in DC to remain open. They argued that Palestinian leaders encouraged violence against Israelis, including a wave of knife-wielding attacks in recent months.

UN Condemns Fighting by Syria and Rebels in Golan

The UN Security Council has strongly condemned the fighting and use of heavy weapons by Syrian government troops and armed groups on the Golan Heights. The UN Security Council has strongly condemned the fighting and use of heavy weapons by Syrian government troops and armed groups on the Golan Heights. A resolution co-sponsored by Russia and the United States and adopted unanimously by the council on Tuesday calls on parties to the Syrian conflict to halt military activity there. The resolution extends the mandate of the nearly 800-strong UN peacekeeping force on the Golan Heights until June 30, 2016.

Yedioth Ahronoth – December 23, 2015

The Address: Beirut

By Giora Eiland

The assassination of Samir Kuntar, the rocket fire from Lebanon the following day, and Nasrallah's threatening speech, all increased the fear of a new clash in the north. Beyond analyzing the probability of a such a clash, it is also important to relate to our policy vis-à-vis Lebanon, Syria, and indirectly, Turkey and Russia, which are part of the conflict because of the situation in Syria.

It can cautiously be said that Kuntar's assassination will not trigger a clash in the north. He was not important enough to Hizbullah, and in general, it is not in Hizbullah's interest to open another front since it is increasingly involved in Syria. This situation is liable to change in the event of an incident that prompts a response or counter responses or in wake of a change in the situation and a change in Hizbullah priorities or those of its patron (Iran).

As far as Israel is concerned, it is important to stick to one principle: if and when acts of hostility begin from Lebanese territory, they must lead to a war between the State of Israel and the State of Lebanon. In the Second Lebanon War, we tried to only defeat Hizbullah, leaving the State of Lebanon, its government, its army and its infrastructure outside the game. If we prosecute the third Lebanon War in the same way, the outcome will be much more dismal compared to the last war.

Why is that? After all, ostensibly, we have greatly improved since 2006. The problem is that on the tactical level, and mainly in regard to the number of rockets, their size, their range and their accuracy, Hizbullah has improved, relatively, a lot more than us. That is why, if there is a clash, and if it lasts 34 days (like the Second Lebanon War), the damage, the casualties and the destruction in the State of Israel will be unacceptable.

The conclusion is simple: we must prosecute the next war against the State of Lebanon. In addition to Hizbullah targets, we must also attack the Lebanese army, the infrastructure in Lebanon, the airports and seaports and every other strategic asset. Since no country in the world (Syria and Iran on the one hand, and Saudi Arabia, Europe and the US on the other hand) want a Lebanon in ruins, and since that would be the inevitable result of an all-out war between Israel and Lebanon, there will be enormous global pressure on all sides to reach a cease-fire after three days, and not 34, and that is exactly what Israel wants.

Ostensibly, the correct strategy can be decided only when the clash starts, but that was precisely the big mistake that was made in 2006. It is vital that the explanations for the policy that you intend to pursue be given to the world, mainly to the US, ahead of time, and clearly. The benefit will be twofold: first, it will be possible to prevent the war this way, since most of the world is indifferent to any blow to Hizbullah (and to Israel) but it will not be indifferent to the possibility of Lebanon's destruction: second, when war breaks out, it is too late to persuade the world of the justice of the path you've chosen to fight.

Israel's policy toward Syria is more complex. As of now, we can be passive and only intervene when a pinpoint assassination is necessary.

Our influence on events in Syria is very limited, and even so, it should be said plainly: it is better for Israel to support the Russian approach, which talks about reaching an arrangement in Syria, with or without Bashar Assad, rather than support the disintegration of the existing regime. True, the fall of the regime in Syria would hurt Iran and Hizbullah, but not everything that is bad for the enemy is necessarily good for us. The fall of the regime in Syria will put ISIS on our border. That may not be so terrible, but ISIS control over Syria will very quickly led to its takeover of Jordan, and that is a development that would dramatically worsen our situation.

How to Revive Arab Peace Initiative

By Akiva Eldar

The few Russian tourists who visited the Grand Park Hotel in Antalya, Turkey, on Dec. 17-19, despite the tensions between Moscow and Ankara, could not have known that the women and men conversing easily at adjacent tables represent an occupier and the occupied. Anyone following the deterioration in the Israeli-Palestinian dialogue would have found it hard to believe that these men and women came to Antalya to look together for ways to save the two-state solution, using the Arab Peace Initiative . After breakfast they took their places around a long rectangular table in one of the meeting rooms.

Next to them at the table were also two Knesset members from the Zionist Camp and one from the Meretz Party. Present, too, was a former member of the Palestinian Cabinet, clerics from the Gaza Strip and East Jerusalem, a senior Arab League diplomat and three other diplomats — an American, a European and a Turk. For participants to express their views freely, the hosts from the AJEEC-NISPED organization asked everyone to avoid publicizing each other's names and quoting them directly. Therefore, the insights from the conference will not be attributed to specific participants.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The first insight: The 2002 Arab Peace Initiative is in force. It is likely to be ratified at the upcoming 2016 Arab League conference in Morocco in March. Despite Israel's refusal to adopt the initiative and to even discuss it, important Arab states — led by Egypt and Saudi Arabia — are still on board and are unwilling to amend its principles. Nonetheless, in light of the instability in Syria and uncertainty regarding its future, implementation of the article about normalizing relations with Israel in return for its withdrawal to the 1967 border lines is not conditional on its withdrawal from the Golan Heights. Suffice it for Israel to adopt the principles of the initiative — along with its willingness for land swaps in the West Bank and East Jerusalem — to launch steps for the normalization of ties with states such as Saudi Arabia.

The Arabs find it hard to understand why such a generous peace initiative is unable to capture the hearts of the Jewish-Israeli public. Among the centrist and left-wing Zionist parties there is a broad consensus in immediate recognition of the establishment of a Palestinian state, based on the June 4, 1967, lines. There is agreement that Israel must accept its responsibility for the refugee problem, including that of the 1948 refugees uprooted from their villages and lives in Israel, and toward efforts to resolve it — without full implementation of the right of return.

According to the views of the Zionist Camp and Meretz representatives, dramatic gestures the likes of the Jerusalem visit by late Egyptian President Anwar Sadat in 1977 will make it easier for them to sell the initiative as part of a made-in-Israel diplomatic plan. Nonetheless, in their view, the road to regional peace goes through the ballot boxes. For a leader to implement a policy toward a comprehensive arrangement and an end to the conflict, the leader must convince the public that handing the West Bank over to the Palestinians will not turn it into a second Gaza. Therefore, it is essential to establish a regional-international security mechanism that will reduce the threat of a hostile takeover of Palestine by Hamas or other external forces.

Second insight: A US diplomatic initiative is unlikely in the short time left to President Barack Obama in office, including the transition period between the elections and the new president taking office. At best, as far as the peace camp is concerned, Obama will abstain from a US veto on a UN Security Council vote granting full recognition to an independent Palestinian state. Washington has already indicated to the Palestinians that US aid to the Palestinian Authority would be suspended if they appeal to the United Nations. The American representatives believe that in 2017 — the new president's first year in office — he (or she) is not expected to focus on defrosting the Israeli-Palestinian peace process.

Third insight: Europe is increasingly frustrated with Israel's promotion of the settlement enterprise at the expense of the basic rights of the Palestinians. The sharp, almost rude language of the Israeli reaction to the EU decision to label settlement products increased the fury in European capitals. Even Germany, considered the protective shield of the right-wing Israeli government vis-a-vis the European Union, decided to implement the decision. Two new initiatives are being formulated these days in the EU, regarding the settlements. One, to avoid meetings with Israeli politicians who live in the occupied territories, such as minister Ze'ev Elkin and Knesset member Avigdor Liberman. The other, to ban the entry of settlers to EU member states, by a law requiring Israelis to ask for a visa ahead of the journey. This way, EU authorities could verify exactly where the applicant lives.

Several European states are trying to fill the vacuum left by the United States in the Israeli-Palestinian arena. The French Foreign Ministry is trying to line up support for a European diplomatic initiative to promote recognition of a Palestinian state along with a formula expressing the Jewish identity of the State of Israel. At the same time, Spain is seeking support for an international conference next year, marking the 25th anniversary of the Madrid Conference (1991). That conference brought together representatives from Arab states, Israel, the United States, Russia, Europe, China, Japan and the UN, and launched talks (that proved fruitless) between the government of Yitzhak Shamir and the Palestinians, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. At the same time, plans are afoot to renew the activity of the five multilateral committees created as a result of the conference on the issues of arms control, economic cooperation, refugees, water and the environment.

Fourth insight: The Arab Peace Initiative serves as a common denominator for discourse among Muslim clerics and Jews. Serious peace talks, based on the Arab initiative, will help religious Muslim and Jewish elements to deal with radical religious organization taking advantage of the hostility toward the occupation and turning the political conflict into a religious war.

And a final insight: Now of all times, when the diplomatic process between Israelis and Palestinians is at a deadlock, and when no solution can be seen on the horizon, such ongoing encounters between the parties involved in the conflict together with religious figures and central international elements, are of outmost importance. The Arab initiative is the most important peace plan to be born ever since the start of the Jewish-Arab conflict. And so, it must be at the center of these meetings. It must not be allowed to die.

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS

Yesterday Hillary Clinton visited her Brooklyn headquarters for the first time since she joined the presidential race a month ago. She then took an unannounced stroll in Brooklyn Heights meeting shop owners and others that welcomed her to the neighborhood.

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton came out on Thursday in full support of allowing certain undocumented young people to join the military, as the House of Representatives debates the issue. Her campaign issued a statement in support of allowing young undocumented immigrants who came to the U.S. as children, called DREAMers, to enlist.

Thursday chairman, Representative Trey Gowdy, said he would not call Hillary Rodham Clinton to testify until the State Department turned over a trove of documents about the episode. This statement likely pushes Hillary Clinton's appearance to no earlier than this summer.

ABC News chief anchor George Stephanopoulos has given $50,000 to the Clinton Foundation in recent years, charitable contributions that he did not publicly disclose while reporting on the Clintons or their nonprofit organization. He said in an interview yesterday that he will not moderate the ABC News-sponsored Republican primary debate in February after failing to disclose those contributions.

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS

Jeb Bush/Iraq coverage on each network. ABC noted that Bush clarified his position for the fifth time today. NBC included Republican criticism of Jeb Bush's answers, as well as the clip of a student telling Bush that George W. Bush created ISIS. CBS also included coverage of Bush changing his answer multiple times throughout the week and John Dickerson said that the GOP nominee will have to face the likely nominee of HRC, who voted to authorize the Iraq war.

Hillary Clinton Campaign: Let Dreamers Serve In The Military // Huffington Post // Elise Foley - May 14, 2015

WASHINGTON -- Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton came out on Thursday in full support of allowing certain undocumented young people to join the military, as the House of Representatives debates the issue.

Her campaign issued a statement in support of allowing young undocumented immigrants who came to the U.S. as children, often called Dreamers, to enlist.

"If these courageous young men and women want to serve, they should be honored and celebrated, not discriminated against," Clinton's national political director, Amanda Renteria, said. "Hillary Clinton is committed to comprehensive immigration reform to strengthen families and our country. While we keep up the pressure for comprehensive action, allowing Dreamers to serve in the military is the right step forward."

The House is set to vote later Thursday on whether to strip a measure from the National Defense Authorization Act that would encourage the secretary of defense to consider allowing certain Dreamers to enlist.

The measure, offered by Rep. Ruben Gallego (D-Ariz.) does not mandate that the Defense Department allow more Dreamers to join the army. But it still caused controversy among Republicans, who said it would be an implicit endorsement of the "amnesty" programs by President Barack Obama.

Democrats are arguing that all Dreamers granted work authorization under Obama's 2012 Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals program, or DACA, should be able to enlist, although Gallego's measure would not require such a policy change.

Clinton has taken a liberal turn on immigration during her presidential campaign this year. She recently voiced support for driver's licenses for undocumented immigrants, after opposing them during her 2008 presidential campaign.

Last month, Clinton told a group of Dreamers that she would support going even further than Obama to protect certain undocumented immigrants from deportation.

Hillary Clinton Makes First Visit to Brooklyn Since Announcing Campaign // NYT // May 14, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton on Thursday made her first trip to Brooklyn since she joined the presidential race a month ago, visiting her headquarters and taking an unannounced stroll in Brooklyn Heights.

Then she headed to a meeting for donors who have secured at least 10 checks totaling $2,700.

Mrs. Clinton spent about an hour in her headquarters at 1 Pierrepont Plaza, shaking hands and meeting people, aides said. She told them it was important to win, but also to “have fun,” said her spokesman, Nick Merrill.

She then took a walk through the neighborhood as an aide from the campaign’s digital team used a video camera to record people approaching Mrs. Clinton on the street. The candidate was accompanied by Mr. Merrill, Huma Abedin, a longtime aide, and a few Secret Service agents.

Mrs. Clinton stopped at a pizza place, Monty Q’s, ordering a salad. Next up was Area Kids, a toy store a few doors down, where she bought a child’s romper, presumably for her granddaughter, Charlotte. She then walked a few blocks to the Brooklyn Women’s Exchange, where she bought a second romper.

After that, she headed to the Liberty Warehouse in Red Hook for the donor event, where hundreds of people received small pins with her campaign logo and briefings from officials like Robby Mook, her campaign manager; Jennifer Palmieri, her communications director; and Teddy Goff, the campaign’s digital chief.

Mrs. Clinton — who announced her presidential candidacy on April 12 — was last in Brooklyn on April 1, at an event with Chirlane McCray, the first lady of New York City, to announce a public awareness push to increase cognitive development in young children.

Mrs. Clinton spent more than 40 minutes talking to attendees at the Liberty Warehouse gathering, which included some of her close former aides, including Tom Nides, a Morgan Stanley executive; Steve Elmendorf, a veteran lobbyist and Democratic strategist; Robert Zimmerman, a Democratic National Committee member; and the financier Alan Patricof, a longtime friend and supporter of the Clintons.

She did not urge that people give to the super PAC supporting her, Priorities USA, according to an attendee. But she encouraged people to find additional donors to support her race — and took note of how many super PACs were “sprouting up like mushrooms” on the Republican side, according to former Senator Evan Bayh of Indiana, who attended the event.

She never mentioned her potential Republican opponents, he said, although during an earlier polling presentation by campaign officials, they highlighted that her poll numbers had held steady despite “a couple of tough news cycles,” a reference to controversies over her use of email at the State Department and fund-raising by her family’s foundation. They also barely mentioned her rivals, but did point out that two Republicans, Jeb Bush and Senator Marco Rubio of Florida, have remained “static” in the polls.

Mr. Bayh told reporters that there was a noticeable change in Mrs. Clinton’s demeanor since the 2008 campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“She’s embraced this, in a joyful spirit, which is a nice thing to see,” he said.

“There’s something in some ways about being unsuccessful that can be liberating,” he said in referring to her failed 2008 run. “She didn’t have to run. She’s focused on the fact that it’s really not about her, it’s about where the country needs to go. And that is a liberating perspective.”

She was asked several questions, including about her position on the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal that President Obama is pushing, Mr. Bayh said.

“She said, ‘Look, I want to see what the proposed agreement is before expressing an opinion on it — we need to reap the benefits,'” but also “help the people who would be adversely affected,” Mr. Bayh recalled.

Benghazi Panel Wants Documents Before Hillary Clinton Testifies // NYT //Michael S. Schmidt – May 14, 2015

WASHINGTON — The chairman of the House committee investigating the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya, said on Thursday that he would not call Hillary Rodham Clinton to testify until the State Department turned over a trove of documents about the episode.

The statement by the chairman, Representative Trey Gowdy, Republican of South Carolina, makes it probable that Mrs. Clinton, who had said she was willing to testify this month, will now appear no earlier than this summer.

In a letter to Secretary of State John Kerry, Mr. Gowdy said the State Department had not “produced one single piece of paper responsive to the committee’s request for records” from aides to Mrs. Clinton, the former secretary of state and current Democratic presidential candidate.

Mr. Gowdy originally asked for the documents, which include the aides’ emails and other documents related to Libya, in November. He then issued a broader subpoena in March.

“The pace of State Department document production has become an impediment to the progress of the committee,” Mr. Gowdy said. “Secretary Kerry promised in previous House testimony swift action when it came to producing department documents, now it is time for his department to explain why they have failed to keep his word.”

The State Department said on Thursday that it had given Mr. Gowdy more than 4,000 pages of documents since his November request. “It’s clear the committee doesn’t know how to take ‘yes’ for an answer,” said Alec Gerlach, a department spokesman.

Democrats have charged that Mr. Gowdy is dragging out the process so he can call Mrs. Clinton to testify closer to the 2016 election.

But Mr. Gowdy said that before the committee would allow Mrs. Clinton to testify, it needed the documents “to have some of the completeness” so it could “formulate substantive questions for her on Benghazi.”

Mr. Gowdy had said that he wanted Mrs. Clinton to testify before the committee twice — once about her exclusive use of a personal email account to conduct government business when she was secretary of state, and a second time about the Benghazi attacks, which killed four Americans, including Ambassador J. Christopher Stevens.

But Mrs. Clinton's lawyer said last week that she was willing to testify before the panel only once. Whenever she testifies, she will be prepared to stay as long as necessary to answer all of the committee's questions, said the lawyer, David E. Kendall.

Shortly after Mr. Gowdy sent his letter, the ranking Democrat on the Benghazi committee, Elijah E. Cummings of Maryland, released a statement saying that "Republicans are on a fishing expedition for anything they can use against Secretary Clinton in her presidential campaign."

"Every time they come back empty-handed, they extend their trip at taxpayer expense," Mr. Cummings said. "The committee has had Secretary Clinton's emails for months. This new claim that the department has not produced a single responsive document is completely baseless."

Stephanopoulos regrets Clinton Foundation donation, will not moderate GOP debate // Politico // Dylan Byers - May 14, 2015

George Stephanopoulos says he should not have donated money to the Clinton Foundation and that he will not moderate the ABC News-sponsored Republican primary debate in February after failing to disclose those contributions.

In an interview with the On Media blog on Thursday, Stephanopoulos said that while he made the donations "for the best reasons," he now realizes he should not have given.

"In retrospect, I probably shouldn't have, even though I did it for the best reasons," he said.

Stephanopoulos also said that he has given a total of $75,000 to the Clinton Foundation. That figure represents charitable contributions of $25,000 in 2012, 2013 and 2014, respectively. ABC News initially said that Stephanopoulos had given a total of $50,000 to the foundation.

The "Good Morning America" co-anchor and host of "This Week" said that he would not moderate ABC's GOP debate, which is scheduled to take place in February in New Hampshire. Republican Sen. Rand Paul said Thursday that Stephanopoulos should be prohibited from moderating any debates during the 2016 presidential campaign.

"I won't moderate that debate," Stephanopoulos said. "I think I've shown that I can moderate debates fairly. That said, I know there have been questions made about moderating debates this year. I want to be sure I don't deprive viewers of a good debate."

But Stephanopoulos said that he would not recuse himself from coverage of the 2016 presidential campaign, despite urging from the office of Republican Sen. Mike Lee of Utah, which said Thursday that Sen. Lee would be advised not to go on "This Week" unless the host "recuses himself from all 2016 coverage."

Throughout the interview, Stephanopoulos apologized profusely for failing to disclose his contributions to viewers, including during an interview with author Peter Schweizer, whose book "Clinton Cash," alleges that donations to the foundation may have influenced some of Hillary Clinton's actions as secretary of state. On Thursday, Schweizer accused Stephanopoulos of a "massive breach of ethical standards."

"At the time I did not perceive the problem, but in retrospect, as much as I support the very good work that's been done by the foundation, I should have gone above and beyond any guidelines to make sure that there wouldn't be any appearance of any conflict," he said.

Stephanopoulos would not say whether it had crossed his mind to disclose the issue earlier. Instead, he said he "believed that the donations already were a matter of public record" because his name is listed among donors on the Clinton Foundation's website.

"But I should have gone the extra mile and disclosed [the donations] to the viewers," Stephanopoulos reiterated. "I now realize I should have done that."

ABC News has issued a statement of support for Stephanopoulos and said it would take no punitive action against him. Stephanopoulous would not say whether he believed he deserved any sort of punitive repercussion.

"I'm sorry to both the ABC viewers and to my colleagues, but I intend to move forward and prove that I can do the job every single day," he said.

The host also said he intends to address the issue on this Sunday's edition of "This Week."

Stephanopoulos is the chief anchor and chief political correspondent for ABC News, as well as the co-anchor of ABC's "Good Morning America" and host of "This Week," its Sunday morning public affairs program. Prior to joining ABC News, he served as communications director and senior adviser for policy and strategy to President Clinton. He also served as communications director on Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign.

Sources with knowledge of Stephanopoulos' charitable giving said he gives to dozens of charities every year and that the total sum of these annual contributions is in the millions of dollars. Those sources said that the Clinton Foundation contributions represent a very small percentage of the total.

Can Hillary Clinton Move Beyond Benghazi? // Newsweek // Nina Burleigh - May 14, 2015

On October 28, 2009, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton arrived in Islamabad, Pakistan, for a three-day visit—without a headscarf. As the motorcade snaked through the city, Osama bin Laden was still hiding out with his wives less than an hour away, and Clinton was greeted with placards reading "Hillery [sic] Go Home." Shortly after she landed, a car bomb exploded in Peshawar, Pakistan, killing more than 100, and scenes of carnage were broadcast along with her televised welcome.

Traditionally when the boss rolls into town, U.S. embassies arrange a meeting with national leaders, a press conference and maybe a reception before escorting the secretary back to the tarmac. But Clinton had added a new duty: organizing the "Townterview." These awkwardly nicknamed, often televised gatherings with vetted natives reprised the town halls and "listening tours" that had been a hallmark of Clinton's style as first lady, U.S. senator and presidential candidate. The idea was to use her star power to rehabilitate America's image. "In an age of connectivity," Clinton policy aide Jake Sullivan explains, "even in authoritarian countries, public opinion matters. Hillary Clinton going out and reaching millions of people around the world through a give-and-take conversation, broadcast live, helped advance the sense that the United States is listening."

So embassy staff in Pakistan had arranged a small listening tour for Madame Secretary. Some aides had a bad feeling about the Townterview in Islamabad and a later one scheduled in Lahore. "They warned, 'You'll be a punching bag,'" Clinton wrote in her State Department memoir, Hard Choices. "I smiled and replied, 'Punch away.'"

Clinton got what she asked for when she faced female Pakistani journalists and an audience of professional women who had been told belatedly that they'd be participating in a televised format similar to The View. Whoopi and Babs they were not; they grilled Clinton, angered about what they saw as American designs on Pakistani nuclear power and U.S. support for archfoe India. Things got worse in Lahore, where university students asked about drones and trigger-happy American contractors. She nodded in her trademark way and crafted calibrated answers, but she won few hearts or minds.

The New York Times reported that in Lahore Clinton sounded "less like a diplomat and more like a marriage counselor." She did manage to land a punch, though, becoming the highest U.S. official to publicly accuse Pakistan of hiding the Al-Qaeda leader: "I find it hard to believe that nobody in your government knows where they are and couldn't get to them if they really wanted to."

The trip was not a seminal moment in Pakistani-American relations, but it typified Clinton's style as secretary of state in many ways: the good soldier taking a hit for the team; the career "listener" with unshakable faith in the power of her charm and reasonableness; the hawkish tendency; the innovative executive; the deft verbal strategist; and the star pupil who did the most homework and got a gold star from the teacher, in this case the White House.

In Washington, despite the obsession on Benghazi (13 hearings and 25,000 pages of reports, at last count, on the killing of the U.S. ambassador and three other Americans; with her House committee testimony scheduled for mid-May), conventional wisdom holds that Secretary Clinton was good in her last job. She just left no legacy. "Competent" but "not a great one," wrote Michael Hirsh of her in Foreign Affairs, as she stepped down from the secretary's post in 2013.

Dismissing Clinton's performance at State as mediocre misses the point. Her great strengths—personal charm, innovative thinking, political savvy—were not up to the task of taming the likes of Putin, Assad, the Taliban, Boko Haram or the rest of the savage world in chaotic times. It's difficult to imagine any wise man now or in history—Henry Kissinger or Thomas Jefferson, to name two—being able to create order from a world in which a 1,000-year-old invention, the nation-state, is under siege everywhere.

The right question is whether Hillary did well with what she had, and the consensus answer is yes. Her policies sometimes fell short (the Russia reset, designed to improve relations with Moscow), but more often they were right (the Asia pivot to devote more U.S. attention to the Far East).Critics often assume that to be a "great" secretary of state, a major diplomatic treaty must be crafted or a war ended. But modern secretaries of state are more managers than Metternichs—they don't necessarily have the grand visions of the world that the 19th century Austrian diplomat did. They confront foes and soothe friends and often they fail. Clinton was no exception, but her performance rating is of special interest now because her tenure at State reveals a lot about how she might operate as president.

LIKABLE ENOUGH

Clinton was the third woman to be secretary of state after Madeleine Albright and Condoleezza Rice. She sailed through her confirmation hearings promising to use "smart power," a wonky variation on "soft power," which was a too-girly-sounding strategy. Smart power implied a more equally distributed application of the military and the softer powers—diplomatic and development tools—than had been the norm in the George W. Bush years, when belligerent "military-think" predominated.

Clinton's job, as Barack Obama imagined it, was to win back some friends for America after the middle-finger stance of the W years. And according to a survey conducted by the Pew Research Center's Global Attitudes Project, she did that. In 2008, America's overall favorability rating hit abysmal lows—in the 20s and 30s. By 2014, according to Pew, a global median of 65 percent had a positive opinion about America. Some of that was due to Bush leaving the White House and the hope invested in Obama, but some credit surely belongs to Clinton.

But her job was about more than refurbishing America's image. It was about managing relationships—with heads of state, with fellow Cabinet members (the State vs. Defense rivalry is one of Washington's oldest) and with Obama, not to mention the State Department's 70,000 careerists. It was her first run as an executive instead of a first lady, senator, law partner or chairwoman (of the Children's Defense Fund). Finally, she had to manage her relationship to power—for many women, the trickiest relationship of all.

It was her first run as an executive instead of a first lady, senator, law partner or chairwoman (of the Children's Defense Fund). Finally, she had to manage her relationship to power—for many women, the trickiest relationship of all.

She was a celebrity humbly serving a former rival in the Democratic presidential primaries who had once sneered that she was "likable enough." A popular Clinton caricature is the scheming Lady Macbeth. The meme was born during her husband's 1992 campaign and refreshed in the decidedly anti-Hillary best-seller about the 2008 primaries, Game Change, which gleefully detailed her profane meltdowns in contrast with no-drama Obama.

The giant egos vying for influence in the president's Cabinet, the vast bureaucracy of Foggy Bottom and the sprawling mess of global diplomacy all offered unlimited opportunities to hatch Machiavellian plots. And yet Clinton was a force for "teamwork and discipline" in the Cabinet, according to Obama. As secretary of state, Clinton logged nearly a million miles of air travel (956,733, to be exact), keeping healthy in body and spirit with Methodist prayers and yoga to deliver calm, and a tiny, talismanic bottle of hot sauce to ward off colds. During downtime she lived not with her husband in New York but in spinsterish isolation in Washington with her nonagenarian mother. "I'd come home from a long day at the Senate or State Department, slide in next to her at the small table in our breakfast nook, and let everything pour out," she recalled in her book.

Obama hoped having Clinton run the State Department would give him the space to devote his greatest energies to domestic matters like the passage of health care reform (something she had failed to do during her husband's time in the White House) and averting an economic depression. She took the job on the condition that he agree to meet regularly with her. Beyond that weekly face-to-face, they engaged two to three more times a week on the margins of larger White House meetings, says Sullivan, her aide. "They reinforced and supported one another." During a joint 60 Minutes interview in January 2013 after she resigned, CBS's Steve Kroft tried several times to get Clinton and Obama to reminisce about their political rivalry, but Obama wouldn't bite. Their friendship, he said, was based on "trust [from] being in the foxhole together."

THE SCHMOOZER

On February 10, 2010, Secretary Clinton and her entourage left the Snowmageddon of Washington, D.C., and landed a day later in the desert kingdom of Saudi Arabia. In the blinding sunlight on the tarmac, guards ushered her to King Abdullah's retrofitted bus, where she sat across from the foreign minister, Prince Saud al-Faisal, for a ride to the king's desert retreat. Inside a deluxe, black, six-top tent, she spent 20 minutes chatting with the 85-year-old king, teasing him about his foreign minister's dislike of camels. After a requisite feast, she and the king retreated for a four-hour private meeting from which she emerged "smiling broadly." She soothed ire over Obama's prior visit to the kingdom, during which he had turned to unpleasantries immediately—asking the king to allow El Al to fly over Saudi territory and for him to receive Israeli trade ministers. It had been all too fast and too much for the ancient Arab potentate. "Whoever advised you to ask me this wants to destroy the Saudi-American relationship," the king supposedly said.

In Hard Choices, Clinton recounted how she put her friendship with the Saudi leadership to use. Rights groups were outraged that a 50-year-old Saudi man was about to marry an 8-year-old girl—an act the child's mother opposed but was legal in Riyadh. Saudi courts had rejected the mother's plea to stop the marriage. Clinton quietly intervened by phone. "Fix this on your own, and I won't say a word," she recalled saying to the Saudi authorities. A new judge was appointed, and he granted the child a quickie divorce.

She used the same personal touch behind the scenes with former Afghan President Hamid Karzai, an ally who had gone rogue, double-crossed Obama and was enmeshed in corruption. “Of all the leading members of the national security team, she had the best ability to talk Karzai down,” a former spokesperson at State tells Newsweek. “He is prone to say these crazy things, and she would be the one periodically that would pull him off the ceiling. She would say, ‘Look, Mr. President, I understand you have all these competing constituencies. Let’s try to figure out a solution that works within the context of your politics.” Clinton, the politician, understood the needs of other pols.

She used the same combination of patience, empathy and celebrity that had won over a thobe-draped Saudi potentate and the notoriously difficult Afghan president when confronting one of the greatest crises in the State Department’s internal history.

Just before Thanksgiving 2010, newspapers were preparing to publish excerpts from classified documents released by WikiLeaks, including thousands of diplomatic cables in which far-flung U.S. officials had regaled Washington with candid critiques of world leaders. French President Nicolas Sarkozy was described as an “emperor less than fully dressed”; Turkish Foreign Minister Ahmet Davutoglu was “lost in neo-Ottoman Islamist fantasies”; Australian Prime Minister Kevin Rudd was “a mistake-prone control freak.” Clinton was on record saying Saudi donors were “the most significant source of funding to Sunni terrorist groups worldwide” and complaining that it was “an ongoing challenge” to get Saudi leaders to address the problem. The remark was ironic because the Saudis were among the biggest donors—tens of millions of dollars—to her husband’s Clinton Global Initiative (now called the Clinton Family Foundation).

Today, although WikiLeaks editor Julian Assange is still holed up in the Ecuadorean Embassy in London and Chelsea Manning, the soldier-whistleblower, is in jail, WikiLeaks is basically a blip in the annals of State Department history. At the time, it was such a crisis that some speculated Clinton would have to resign as an act of national contrition.

Instead, she got on the phone. After a long Thanksgiving weekend spent making hundreds of personal apology calls, she had already done private damage control by the time WikiLeaks dropped its bomb on Monday morning. Clinton’s personal relationships and exhausting display of contrition maintained trust between national leaders after the first great leak of the cyberage. The episode also positioned her as a battle-hardened government loyalist when Edward Snowden’s revelations about the National Security Agency peeled back the veil on the vast American cyberspying apparatus.

THE MANAGER

Former Bush and Reagan diplomat Elliott Abrams, a leading neoconservative, thinks Clinton was terrible on the Arab Spring movement and left no worthy legacy. Still, he gives her high marks for management. “Morale in the State Department was very high” under Clinton, he says. “She surrounded herself with some very able young people.”

One of her first administrative acts was to launch the Quadrennial Diplomacy and Development Review (QDDR), modeled on the Pentagon’s Quadrennial Defense Review, aimed at modernizing the structure of the State Department. The first QDDR focused the department on emerging areas such as post-conflict resolution and the cyberworld. She created an office for public-private partnerships and community outreach, and promulgated a manual for the ethical and legal policy rules for such partnerships.

In the hive of the Building—as State Department hands call the eight-story Foggy Bottom headquarters, with its 4,975 rooms—Clinton was queen bee. But she was also the busiest worker bee, ensconced in her elegant seventh-floor office with fireplace, Oriental carpet and soft homey chairs, reading briefing books no one else opened and perpetually scratching items off her legendary checklist. (One adviser believes she was the only top official to actually slog through the briefing books.) It was the same studiousness that had earned her plaudits in the Senate when many expected her to be a show horse.

At State, Clinton reassembled some of her now familiar entourage. It was Hillaryland redux—personal aide Huma Abedin, who endured the tawdry Twitter exhibitionism of her husband, Anthony Weiner; politico Philippe Reines; and Cheryl Mills, the infamously protective former deputy White House counsel, who defended Bill Clinton during his impeachment trial. But she also tapped new brains, including Sullivan, who recalls that Clinton insisted upon hearing from people outside the chain of command. During one early meeting on the issue of Muslim extremists in Europe, Sullivan says a George W. Bush holdover, regional expert Farah Pandith, spoke up about how extremism was affecting communities. Clinton, who had not previously met Pandith, quickly made her the State Department's first-ever special representative for Muslim communities.

"That's the kind of thing that would happen [often]," Sullivan says. "She would say…'I want to hear people speak up and disagree.'"

IDEALISTIC REALIST

Clinton could charm, but she could also make cold calculations about how much of her resources to expend. "Our challenge is to be clear-eyed about the world as it is without losing sight of the world as we want it to become," she wrote. "I prefer being considered…an idealistic realist. Because I, like our country, embody both tendencies."

She was more mechanic than messianic, and she harbored no Wilsonian- or W-like schemes to make the world safe for democracy. One country in which she applied her measured approach was Hungary.

In 2010, Hungarians elected a rightist party, Fidesz, that immediately set about writing a new constitution, shackling the media and restricting opposition parties and civil society. The anti-democratic trend was more than a far-off concern because Hungary was about to take its turn at the helm of the E.U. presidency in 2011. And it was alarming because the country was a NATO member that had been on a democratic path and now seemed to be drifting into Moscow's orbit.

Clinton traveled to Hungary in June 2011, intending to share American concerns. As was her custom, she asked the embassy to gather members of civil society groups for a meeting. Ambassador Eleni Kounalakis and her staff arranged to bring in Hungarian journalists, lawyers and rights activists, who talked about how they had been systematically shut out of national decision making. "Secretary Clinton listened intently," Kounalakis recalls. "Then she asked the group what they were going to do about it."

The democratic-minded Hungarians were stunned. The sympathetic, nodding face of the superpower had raised their hopes that the Americans might take a robust role in supporting their cause. (The failure of the Eisenhower administration to support the anti-Communist Hungarian uprising in 1956 is still remembered in Budapest.) Now Clinton was telling them they were still on their own. It was a "sobering and powerful" message, Kounalakis says, meant to prod the Hungarians to fight back.

Later that year, the Hungarian parliament passed anti-democratic measures without the input of civil society groups or opposition parties by a two-thirds vote. Clinton dove back in, with a letter to Hungarian President Viktor Orban detailing U.S. concerns. The letter was leaked, and "headlines roared of the specific concerns that Hillary Clinton and the United States were expressing over Hungarian democracy," Kounalakis wrote in a memoir about her years in Hungary. The gambit worked, and belatedly, European leaders and EU officials who had ignored the situation began speaking out about the Hungarian laws.

Weeks later, Hungary's leaders announced they had "moved too fast" and needed to "make corrections" in the oppressive laws.

That small victory for Clinton was short-lived. A new Hungarian president was installed and soon implemented many of the offending laws: diminishing women's rights, condemning homosexuality and putting the central bank under political authority. Today, anti-Semitism is on the rise, and The Guardian spoke for many when it announced: “Hungary is no longer a democracy.”

Clinton’s modest efforts in Hungary only delayed the inevitable. “Under ordinary diplomatic constraints she did as much as she could very effectively,” Kounalakis says. “I am convinced that her leadership and engagement brought positive change to that country. But, as a realist, there is a limit to U.S. engagement in the internal affairs of a NATO ally.”

Clinton used soft power and personal clout to help push back on an authoritarian regime. It didn’t work, but it seems unlikely that any secretary of state would have had better luck. The U.S. was no more willing to use force than Eisenhower was almost 60 years ago, and there was no support from allies for sanctions. The episode illuminates the limits of U.S. power in the 21st century, and it shows Clinton doing the best she could with a very weak hand.

THE HAWK

Last year, Mother Jones published a column titled “Who Said It?” that challenged readers to figure out which hawkish statements were uttered by Hillary Clinton and which came from Republican Senator John McCain. Progressives suspect Clinton has neocon in her veins because of her vote to authorize the use of force in Iraq. They’re probably right. She doesn’t share McCain’s dismay at the withdrawal of American troops in Iraq on her watch, but as secretary she was rarely, if ever, the dove in the room.

This became apparent when it came to Libya, long before the notorious 2012 Benghazi attack. The Libya crisis escalated from unrest into civil war during March 2011. The Arab Spring had come to Libya, and its leader, Muammar Qaddafi, had vowed to exterminate his opponents. With a humanitarian disaster looming, the sentiment in the West was swinging toward intervention.

By the time Clinton landed in Paris on March 14 for a meeting of the G-8, even Arab League members were calling for “robust” action in Libya, and Sarkozy was all but brandishing a sword. Clinton sided with two other Obama national security counselors, Samantha Power and Susan Rice, in supporting military intervention for humanitarian reasons. Pundits took to calling them “the three Valkyries,” but in Paris she was in no rush to send bombs over Tripoli, reflecting the mood in Obama’s situation room. “I was sympathetic but not convinced,” she later wrote.

Then the Arab League voted to request a no-fly zone over Libya. As terrified Libyan civilians waited for Qaddafi to start his slaughter, Sarkozy dispatched French warplanes to Libya without conferring with the British or Americans. After that, Clinton wrote, “there was no time for hesitation.” A few hours later, U.S. Navy warships fired more than 100 cruise missiles at Libyan air defenses and ground troops.

Critics blamed America’s reluctance to bomb on a strategy—or lack of one—that came to be called “leading from behind.” Clinton denies that: “It took a great deal of leading—from the front, the side, and every other direction—to authorize and accomplish the mission and to prevent what might have been the loss of tens of thousands of lives.”

Fair enough, but her willingness to use force in Libya—and her later eagerness to arm Syrian rebels—makes her complicit in the at best confused, and at worst failed, American response to the Arab uprisings. The attacks in Libya left that country in chaos and open to colonization by North African Islamists, and created the current refugee crisis in the Mediterranean. Clinton might not be another McCain, but she is a liberal hawk, convinced that bombs can be humanitarian. And though NATO airstrikes may have brought an end to Serbian oppression during her husband’s presidency, in this century good intentions have not often been rewarded. Like George W. Bush, she promoted U.S. military action that left a repressive Arab country in anarchy.

HALF THE POPULATION

In 1995, Clinton became the first representative of a superpower to equate women's rights with human rights, a seminal moment that made her a hero to women worldwide. It put the world on notice that if you beat your wife or denied your daughter an education, it was no longer a private matter.

One of her first acts at the State Department was to appoint her White House chief of staff, Melanne Verveer, as ambassador-at-large for women's issues. "My role…was not to oversee 'special projects,'" says Verveer, who has been with Clinton since 1997. "It was to play an integrationist role, so [women's] issues would be integrated throughout the State Department."

Verveer tells Newsweek her chief achievement was collecting and disseminating data to other nations on how women's involvement affects economies favorably: "Data shows women's participation creates jobs and influences security. No country doesn't want to grow its economy." Other high-profile women's initiatives included a public-private project (in alliance with the Clinton Global Initiative) to bring cookstoves to women in poverty-stricken areas. On the policy side, Clinton persuaded Obama to sign a National Action Plan that put the U.S. behind a long-standing U.N. resolution to involve more women in conflict resolution, peace and security.

With Verveer dispatched around the globe to talk about women, Clinton could be a feminist without getting on a soapbox. She rarely spoke out publicly, for example, about the egregious mistreatment of women by America's allies in the Gulf. For human rights observers, that reticence was a signal flaw, but her colleagues say her feminist instincts are unassailable. "We all know successful women who wouldn't go near a woman's issue because that detracts from her ability to play in the big leagues," Verveer says. "Well, Hillary understands you can't write off half the population in the world."

BLOOD THINNERS

Coming home after long days grappling with apocalyptic global mayhem, Clinton relied not on her husband but on her aged mother to help her unwind. Dorothy Rodham's death in November 2011 left Clinton alone, and the pace eventually took a physical toll.

"The exhaustion is always there," says Verveer. "These are killer jobs, very hard jobs, especially if you do them in intensive ways." Clinton had walked into State exuding energy, and crawled out four years later, straight into a hospital. She fell and smacked her head during a woozy episode in what was reportedly a bout with a stomach virus in late 2012. The accident left her with a dangerous blood clot behind the right ear, requiring hospital observation and a regimen of blood thinners.

She no longer has to tangle with Putin or Karzai. Now she faces angry investigative committees. But she's been here before. Committees have come and gone, from Whitewater to impeachment, and she's still around.

Whatever happens to her presidential bid, the years at State seem to have released her from the defensive crouch she maintained during her first lady years. Verveer says Clinton has evolved into a happier person. "When we first got to know each other, she was in a position solely by virtue of her marriage. How many times did you hear people say, 'Who elected her?'"

Stints as first lady in Arkansas and the White House are not a good launch pad for any modern politician, but Clinton captured a U.S. Senate seat in 2000 with a lot more than her last name. Based on résumé alone, Hillary Clinton is arguably more qualified to run the White House than her husband was when he got elected president in 1992. In terms of job training, 14 years as governor of Arkansas do not match eight years in the White House (granted, as a spouse), six in the Senate and four traveling the globe as secretary of state during one of the most chaotic eras in memory.

Early in American history, secretary of state was a steppingstone to the presidency. Jefferson was among six men to use it as a rung, but it has been 160 years since the nation's top diplomat was elected president. On our fractious and yet hyper-connected planet, where events in Pakistan reverberate in New York City, a stint at State ought to be a résumé builder for the presidency, but as former National Security Council spokesman Tommy Vietor said to Foreign Policy recently, "I do believe that not a single voter will make their decision based on her policy towards Burma. You'll be lucky if they know where the fuck it is." Historian Douglas Brinkley put it more politely: "You've got to play big in Des Moines, not in Paris."

Clinton's time at State proved the professional "listener" can also make men listen. Obama affirmed that when he said on 60 Minutes, "One thing I will always be grateful for" was Clinton's way with big egos. "We had [Defense Secretary] Bob Gates and [CIA Director] Leon Panetta and a lot of strong personalities around the table," he said, noting she had "established a standard in terms of professionalism and teamwork." Gates, who served in both Bush administrations, was even more effusive in his praise: "I found her smart, idealistic but pragmatic, tough-minded, indefatigable, funny, a very valuable colleague, and a superb representative of the United States all over the world."

Beyond the Beltway, Clinton's stint as America's top diplomat earned her other sorts of devoted fans. Google Executive Chairman Eric Schmidt, who is backing her campaign, has called Clinton "the most consequential secretary of state since Dean Acheson."

Sullivan, Clinton's aide, who admits he is a fan (he also might become the youngest national security adviser in history if she's elected), calls her relationship with the men in Obama's Cabinet "a high-water mark" of her term at State. "People leaned forward when she spoke," he says. For a woman working in rooms full of men, there is perhaps no higher praise.

What Do Prison Families Think of Hillary's Promises About Mass Incarceration? // The Intercept // Liliana Segura - May 13, 2015

Ronald Simpson-Bey remembers the day the Anti-Terrorism and Effective Death Penalty Act was signed into law. "April 24, 1996," he recalls. At the time he was entering his second decade behind bars and working for Prison Legal Services of Michigan, helping fellow prisoners with their appeals. The landmark legislation, signed by President Bill Clinton in the wake of the Oklahoma City bombing, sharply curtailed the federal habeas appeals of people in prison, including those facing execution. Simpson-Bey's office was already so swamped there was a five-year waitlist for new clients. Suddenly, all these people faced a one-year deadline to challenge their cases in federal court. "We panicked," he recalls. "We were like, oh hell no." Incarcerated since 1985 for shooting at a police officer (a crime he insisted was carried out by an associate who turned state's witness), Simpson-Bey was a self-taught paralegal, able to adapt to the stringent new standards the AEDPA imposed on his own case. But for others, who did not understand the law, it swiftly closed the door on their federal appeals. "It was so traumatic," Simpson-Bey says. "Heartbreaking."

We were discussing Hillary Clinton's recent vow to "end the era of mass incarceration," a lofty promise that would mean undoing decades of criminal justice policy, including sweeping measures enacted by her husband, largely with her support. The groundwork for mass incarceration may have started years before, but "Clinton was the biggest prison builder in the country," Simpson-Bey said.

The AEDPA was not the first time Clinton had shown how punitive a Democrat could be. Two years earlier, Clinton had signed the Violent Crime Control and Law Enforcement Act (known as the 1994 Omnibus Crime Bill) — a grab bag of "tough on crime" legislation that poured billions of federal dollars into new prison construction and hundreds of millions in incentive grants for states to pass Truth-in-Sentencing laws. Then there was the Prison Litigation Reform Act, which made it more difficult for prisoners to challenge their conditions of confinement. Supporters said it would curb "frivolous lawsuits." But Simpson-Bey, who was part of a historic class-action in Michigan demanding better psychiatric services and less time in segregation, knew it was about much more than that. "This was an era where they were building these prisons and, at the same time, making it harder for people to get out by denying access to courts," Simpson-Bey explains.

Simpson-Bey finally left prison three years ago, taking a plea deal after his conviction was overturned. In total he spent 27 years behind bars. Today he works for the American Friends Service Committee and is active in groups like the recently launched JustLeadershipUSA, which seeks to cut the US prison population in half by 2030. Simpson-Bey was among the attendees last week at the InterNational Prisoner's Family Conference in Dallas, TX, a volunteer-run gathering of activists, ministries, and people with loved ones behind bars. Many participants were once in prison themselves. The presentations were in many ways a devastating reflection of what the Clinton era wrought: families suffering the stigma and isolation of having a loved one on a sex offender registry (the 1994 Crime Bill mandated that states begin tracking sex offenders); fathers trying to overcome barriers to reentry (Clinton's 1995 welfare reform banned federal benefits like housing assistance and food stamps to felons); death row families on the "disenfranchised grief" of those whose relatives are condemned to die (Clinton personified the Democrats' embrace of capital punishment, attending the execution of a brain damaged man while on the campaign trail and expanding capital crimes).

As the conference got underway, Clinton himself was making headlines for telling CNN that his 1994 Crime Bill "cast too wide a net" and put "too many people in prison." On the heels of Hillary's big criminal justice speech, the political calculus was clear. But in Dallas, no one seemed to be paying much attention to what either Clinton had to say. Instead, there were tips to share about navigating the prison bureaucracy that rules so much of their lives. There was the need to grapple with the "ripple effect" of incarceration (often referred to by the more clinical "collateral consequences") — the way the criminal justice system splits families into pieces. When veteran activist Barbara Allen described in her thick New York accent how her late husband's imprisonment in 1966 marked the start of her serving her time, the audience murmured with recognition.

Allen founded Prison Families Anonymous on Long Island 40 years ago. Although she rejects the label "support group" — "we're a family" – it provides a space to help other women and families cope with a loved one's imprisonment. Despite the overwhelming number of people touched by mass incarceration, prisoners' family members often feel invisible – and compelled to stay that way. One woman recalled making small talk about her work at a dentist appointment. The dental hygienist waited for her boss to leave the room before whispering to her, "I've got a brother in prison." Shame and stigma make the already difficult work of political organizing even harder. But there is strength in visibility, and in numbers: in Dallas, the same women whose voices shook because they were new to public speaking later approached other nervous presenters to encourage them, to say they'd done a great job.

In this environment, where people shared their most intimate trauma and talked seriously about healing, bringing up 2016 felt almost crass and out of place. When I did, the phrase "jumping on the bandwagon" came up again and again. "I'm not a political animal," said Carolyn Esparza, the conference founder, when asked about the election. "I know Hillary said she wants to end mass incarceration. But to be honest with you, I don't trust any politician. Any." Esparza, a social worker who has spent her career inside prisons, advocates for juveniles serving long sentences, including for violent crimes — an issue untouched by candidates for any office.

"She's trying to get elected," scoffed Yvette Reeves about Hillary Clinton. Reeves is married to a man serving a 216-year sentence in California for a crime he insists he did not commit. Her life sounds like an exhausting mix of work, prison visits (he's incarcerated more than 280 miles away), and efforts to start her own advocacy group, tentatively called Prisoner Family Nation. She is also determined to fight somehow for the repeal of AEDPA, which stands directly in the way of her husband's innocence claim, and which she says was passed with no real consideration. "Everyone was so hyped up about Oklahoma and it being domestic terrorism, they didn't read it thoroughly," she said. Just trying to understand the law has taken enormous energy — "I spend so much time at the law library it's ridiculous" — and it angers her that people in prison are expected to apply concepts that attorneys spend years in law school to comprehend. Hillary may not have been directly responsible for AEDPA, Reeves says, but as an attorney she could have looked at the bill more closely. "When I found out that Bill Clinton was the one that signed it, I was like how could you do this? You were my favorite president!"

When politics was on the conference program, it was mainly to share strategies at the most practical level: How to get the attention of a local representative or legislative aid; convincing Department of Correction officials who feel like "the enemy" to post information for families on their websites. Successes can be fleeting – lawmakers will finally grasp the need for reform only to leave office before a bill can be passed. "Then we have to start all over again."

To hear what it takes to win even incremental reforms in a single locale – then try to multiply the need across the vast map of US prisons and jails – was to begin to see the contours of mass incarceration on its true, horrifying scale. It also helped explain the disconnect between the conference and the presidential race: For decades, "tough on crime" policies – under Reagan, under Clinton — passed easily, rapidly creating a prison system of unprecedented proportions. The damage will be much, much harder to undo. Much of it — in collective trauma, in ruined lives — cannot be undone. And even a president who is completely sincere about curbing mass incarceration would have limited means to do so. Dismantling specific policies will require new legislation – most of it at the state level. Federal prisons account for only a fraction of the incarcerated population. And prosecutors still wield enormous power to decide who goes to prison, for how long.

Still, there are some obvious places to start. Michigan activist Lois DeMott, whose teenage son, Kevin, spent traumatic bouts in solitary confinement as a result of his mental illness, pointed to an aspect of the 1994 Crime Bill that should be reversed: "Bill Clinton was the one who really cut the funding for the college programs," she says, referring to the elimination of Pell grants that provided access to higher education to people behind bars. When it comes to Hillary, "I'm just like, okay, is this for real? Does she understand that her husband did something that really set back and harmed not only the people inside, but their families, by cutting off that education? I don't know. I'd like to ask her about that."

To Xavier McElrath-Bey, who scraped by and got his degree in an Illinois prison right before the funding dried up, taking college courses from prisoners was the cruelest, most counterproductive thing politicians could do. Sentenced to 25 years at the age of 13 for a gang-related murder on Chicago's South Side, McElrath-Bey grew up amid extreme poverty, abuse and neglect – he had previously been arrested 19 times, beginning at age nine. Yet he described how children like him were pathologized as intrinsically bad. "We've come from a generation that they were saying were 'superpredators,'" he told attendees on the last day of the conference. "They said that we were incorrigible, that we were beyond repair. They stated that we were godless, fatherless, heartless monsters. These were professors and researchers who fed the media the hype of an impending flood of juvenile crime that never actually occurred."

The superpredator myth – long since discredited — was perpetuated by Hillary Clinton herself. The same day McElrath-Bey spoke, Buzzfeed pulled up a speech she delivered at Keene State University in 1996, in which she boasted that her husband's crime policy was designed to rein in juvenile criminals who "are not just gangs of kids anymore. They are often the kinds of kids that are called 'super-predators.' No conscience, no empathy."

Dehumanizing kids had consequences. Speaking alongside McElrath-Bey was Sara Kruzan, who became a victim of sex trafficking at age 11, at the hands of a man she ultimately shot dead at 16. For this, she was given a life without parole sentence in California. (I wrote about Kruzan here.) Both Kruzan and McElrath-Bey are among the lucky ones: Kruzan was released in 2013 after her sentence was commuted. McElrath-Bey left prison by age 30. Both have devoted themselves to helping kids avoid a similar fate.

If politicians are to be taken seriously, McElrath-Bey told me, they will have to move past the rhetoric. "If you recognize today that [mass incarceration] is truly something that needs to be addressed, then you need not just to talk about it," he said. "You need to get involved in addressing these policies. Just as much as we're expected as offenders and ex-offenders to take responsibility."

The closing keynote was Ronald Simpson-Bey. His speech spoke to the way the criminal justice system divides people into false categories, drawing sharp distinctions between "victims" and "criminals." He described how his mother, after years of enduring abuse, had shot and killed his father. He described how his own adult son was killed by a 14-year-old and how, for all his rage, Simpson-Bey fought to prevent the teenager from going to adult prison because that would only create more harm. Above all, he emphasized what so many other attendees did – from the formerly incarcerated supporting hunger strikers in California to families fighting against video visitation in New York: the people most impacted by mass incarceration must lead the fight against it. He quoted JustLeadershipUSA founder Glenn Martin: "Those closest to the problem are closest to the solution."

Benghazi Panel Republican Criticizes Clinton on Testimony Plans // Bloomberg // Billy House - May 14, 2015

The Republican chairman of a House panel investigating the 2012 attack in Benghazi, Libya, criticized Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton for seeking to limit her testimony before his panel to one appearance.

“Secretary Clinton is insistent she will appear once and only once before the select committee,” Representative Trey Gowdy of South Carolina, chairman of the House Select Committee on Benghazi, said Thursday in a statement.

“The committee must be equally insistent that her appearance is thorough and fully productive,” Gowdy said. “This requires the record to be complete so the members can effectively base their questions on documents.”

Gowdy also released a letter to Secretary of State John Kerry on what he said was the department’s failure to produce e-mails and records for top department officials more than six months after they were first requested.

Gowdy’s committee has been in a standoff with Clinton, the U.S. secretary of state at the time of the attack.

Clinton’s lawyer, David Kendall, wrote to Gowdy earlier this month that she is willing to appear before the committee for questioning once, in public, but not twice as the panel requested.

Democrats have cast the Republican investigations focusing on Clinton as being inspired by partisan politics. Republicans want to keep the investigation and Clinton’s potential appearances before the committee open-ended, they contend.

The committee has said it doesn’t expect to issue a final report on its findings until sometime in 2016, the presidential election year.

Ambassador Christopher Stevens and three other Americans were killed in the attacks on the U.S. diplomatic compound in Benghazi and a nearby CIA outpost.

Multiple Investigations

Republicans have tried for more than two years and through multiple investigations to prove that Clinton failed to bolster security before the assault and shared blame for the initial, erroneous account by President Barack Obama’s administration of what happened.

Those efforts, now concentrated through Gowdy’s committee, were re-energized with the disclosure earlier this year that Clinton used a private e-mail address and home server while secretary of state.

Gowdy had requested that Clinton appear for an interview before his committee to discuss the e-mails during the week of May 18, and again to more broadly discuss the Benghazi attacks by June 18.

Kendall said in a May 4 response that Clinton previously testified for more than five hours before House and Senate committees about the Benghazi attack. Kendall said Clinton was willing testify in public before Gowdy’s panel, though once, not twice.

Clinton's Testimony

In her previous testimony in January 2013, Clinton said she never saw a request for more diplomatic security in Libya, which went to staff members even though all such communications are addressed to the secretary of state by protocol.

She responded with an angry outburst when she was questioned on why the Obama administration didn't know sooner that the attack in Benghazi didn't grow out of a protest.

"The fact is we had four dead Americans," Clinton told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. "Was it because of a protest or was it because of guys out for a walk one night who decided that they'd go kill some Americans? What difference, at this point, does it make?"

GOP Delays Hillary Clinton Benghazi Hearing, Puts Onus on John Kerry // National Journal // Ben Geman - May 14, 2015

The House select committee won't call in the Democratic frontrunner to testify until the State Department hands over documents.

The GOP-led House panel probing the 2012 Benghazi attack has put off plans for a hearing with Hillary Clinton, telling Secretary of State John Kerry in a letter that State's failure to release documents is standing in the way.

"The only thing standing between the Committee and the former Secretary being able to discuss her tenure as Secretary of State as it relates to Libya and Benghazi is the Department of State's failure, in more than half a year, to produce a single, solitary email responsive to our request and subpoena," wrote Rep. Trey Gowdy, chairman of the Select Committee on Benghazi.

Gowdy last month had floated the idea of a hearing to take place as soon as May 18, but now says that lawmakers need more information to inform their questions to Clinton about the fatal attacks and her use of a private email server for State Department business.

"There is still the possibility of scheduling the former Secretary's appearance soon, but that is contingent upon Department of State compliance," Gowdy wrote.

Democrats on the panel allege that Gowdy is delaying the hearing and slow-walking the probe for political reasons.

ADVERTISEMENT

The panel's Republicans have put the ball in Kerry's court and still haven't picked a firm date, but in the meantime, they're preparing for the high-stakes phase of the probe.

Since House Republicans created it a year ago, the Select Committee has kept a low-profile by design, doing most of its probe of the fatal 2012 events outside of public view. But the political glare will soon get much brighter.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A hearing with Clinton will draw massive press scrutiny of not only the Democratic frontrunner, but also her GOP inquisitors, whom Democratic lawmakers and Clinton's political allies accuse of using the process to wound Clinton in the presidential race.

Republicans on the panel have tried to avoid giving off any whiff of politics, even as the Republican National Committee has sought to batter Clinton's electoral prospects with attacks on her email practices.

Ask the House Benghazi committee's Republican members about their plans and you'll get a just-the-facts-ma'am take on the panel's role probing the fatal Benghazi attack, as well as Clinton's use of a private email system for State Department business.

"We would be making the same type of inquiry and conducting ourselves in the same way if it was Secretary Rice or Secretary Powell," said Rep. Susan Brooks, referring to George W. Bush's secretaries of State.

Gowdy was dismissive when asked about the spotlight on Clinton's appearance before the panel. "I don't have any control over scrutiny. You guys decide what's scrutinized and what is not. We have had three public hearings and I have not mentioned her name," Gowdy said.

Both lawmakers spoke to National Journal ahead of Thursday's announcement.

Clinton's appearance will be a high-stakes political affair regardless of what Republicans say about their goals. The pro-Clinton group Correct the Record, which has pushed back against the Benghazi probe, is preparing for rapid-response as Republicans question Clinton.

Adrienne Watson, a spokeswoman for the group, says they will be "ready and nimble" with its press work "as required by the antics of Gowdy's political circus."

The latest flare-up came last week. A committee report on its activities to date said the panel would call Clinton to testify "once it is satisfied that all the relevant information has been provided by both the State Department and her."

Democrats quickly accused Republicans of delaying the Clinton appearance, noting the report signals that Republicans are backing off their plan to have Clinton—who has said through her lawyer that she's ready and willing to testify—appear the week of May 18.

"At every turn, the Select Committee comes up with a new excuse to further delay its work and then blames its glacial pace on someone else," said Rep. Elijah Cummings, the top Democrat on the panel, said last week.

"Republicans are desperately trying to validate the $3 million in taxpayer funds they have spent over the past year, but they have nothing to show for it other than a partisan attack against Secretary Clinton and her campaign for president," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A mid-April letter from Gowdy to Clinton's lawyer said he wanted to hold a hearing that week on her emails and a second one later about the Benghazi attacks. Clinton's lawyer this month rejected the idea of two hearings.

But Republicans insist that they're still awaiting important documents and that the Obama administration's lack of responsiveness has hobbled the investigation.

And Gowdy said that if they're only going to get one chance to question Clinton, they need to come armed with as much information as possible.

"I am not going to ask my members, if they are going to have one opportunity to have a constructive conversation with Secretary Clinton, I am certainly not going to ask my members to have that conversation without the documents they need," he said.

"I try very hard not to tell people in your line of work how to do their job and you all have been really good about not telling me how to do mine, but at some point somebody does need to ask the State Department [why] six months is not long enough to produce emails," Gowdy added.

'Hillary Clinton Sold Her Soul When They Accepted That Money' // Politico Mag // Kenneth Vogel – May 15, 2015

LAAYOUNE, Western Sahara—A day after Bill Clinton feted donors and dignitaries at an extravagant Moroccan feast under a warm Marrakech night sky, a group of local Sahrawi Arabs gathered for tea in a far more humble setting here to share their outrage that Clinton's family foundation had accepted millions of dollars from a company owned by a government accused of repressing their people.

The four men used to work as miners for a subsidiary of OCP, the state-owned phosphate company that paid more than $1 million to sponsor the lavish outdoor gala and the concurrent two-day meeting of the Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton Foundation headlined by the former U.S. president. Its purpose was to highlight efforts by the foundation, its donors and the Moroccan government to improve the lives of marginalized people in North Africa and the Middle East, and Bill Clinton opened the event by praising OCP, King Mohamed VI and "Morocco's longstanding friendship to my family and to the United States."

The former miners have seen a very different side of Morocco's government and OCP. They say the company, formerly called the Office Chérifien des Phosphates, forced them to retire early and slashed their pensions, leaving them struggling to scrape by while hiring ethnic Moroccans for more senior jobs. The miners also told me how they had witnessed first-hand multiple examples of the "arbitrary and prolonged detention" and "physical and verbal abuse" that the U.S. State Department says Moroccan authorities mete out to Sahrawis advocating for independence in Moroccan-occupied Western Sahara.

"Hillary Clinton sold her soul when they accepted that money," declared Mohamed Lahwaimed, who gathered with the other former miners in a second floor walk-up in the Western Sahara capital of Laayoune, a modern-looking desert town with a population of 200,000 people about 500 miles southeast of Marrakech. Wearing traditional Sahrawi dara'a robes and lounging on worn pillows, they sipped green tea and spoke Arabic. "And now we are concerned that if Hillary Clinton wins the presidency of the United States of America, she will take the side of Moroccans even more," Lahwaimed said through an interpreter.

Added fellow former miner Lahbib Salhi, "All the tainted money that Morocco has gathered from taking away our rights has been used to bribe the Clinton Foundation and the international community."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The miners—and human rights activists interviewed in Laayoune—put real faces on abstract criticisms swirling half a world away around Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign. The runaway favorite for the Democratic nomination, Clinton has found herself scrambling to answer suggestions that donations to the family's sprawling $2-billion global charity influenced her actions as secretary of state and could compromise her objectivity as president.

It's certainly true that the Clintons have had a long—and lucrative—relationship with Morocco. Moroccan King Mohamed VI, who was traveling abroad during last week's CGI meeting in Marrakech, nonetheless loaned one of his palaces to Bill and Chelsea Clinton to stay in during the meeting, according to attendees. The king was listed on a donor roll as having pledged as much as $500,000 to the Clinton Foundation to help build Bill Clinton's presidential library (though the foundation says the donation never came through), while the state firm OCP has donated as much as $6 million over the years to the Clinton Foundation's efforts. Both Clintons have publicly embraced the king in recent years as an example of an Arab moderate ruler with whom the U.S. should partner, and leaked Moroccan diplomatic cables show that Hillary Clinton during her tenure as secretary of state was seen by Rabat as among its most ardent supporters in the Obama administration.

There is no evidence that she tailored her official positions to suit Morocco's preferences because of personal or financial relationships. But the overlap between her diplomatic portfolio and the funding for her family's philanthropy illustrates the way nearly any foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation can be viewed through the prism of U.S. policy. And it highlights why countries, companies and individuals that could benefit from her past and possibly future public service might be inclined to support the foundation.

In fact, Hillary Clinton's relationship with Morocco's government was pivotal in brokering last week's Clinton Global Initiative (CGI) meeting in Marrakech, according to sources familiar with the foundation's inner workings. They say that, as CGI was considering options including Hong Kong and Singapore for possible international meetings, the former secretary of state, then serving on the foundation's board, talked to the King about the Moroccan option, which emerged as the frontrunner. Mrs. Clinton herself originally was listed as a meeting host, but she backed out only as her presidential campaign approached, resigning from the foundation soon after officially entering the race.

As the campaign kickoff neared, the foundation proceeded with plans to hold the meeting in Marrakech with funding from OCP despite concerns of some foundation staffers about the political optics of affiliating with a state company tied to the occupation of Western Sahara and the controversial mining of a valuable natural resource, which some observers say violates international law. The approach the staffers settled on was "just to avoid using the word 'Western Sahara' and stay out of it," said one source involved in the planning. "It's not polite to your host."

In a statement, the foundation said that it doesn't have a stance on the Western Sahara dispute and suggested that the issue didn't factor into either the planning of the CGI meeting or the meeting itself. "CGI is not a political or diplomatic organization. CGI does not take political positions on issues and it's critical to our mission that we do not," said the statement. "The purpose of the CGI Middle East & Africa meeting—like all CGI meetings—is to encourage meaningful Commitments to Action that address many issues, and that will ultimately expand access to clean water, create new employment opportunities for young people, and empower women and girls."

The foundation has not facilitated any projects in Western Sahara, officials said, and the plight of the territory was not mentioned at all during the official proceedings last week in Marrakech.

When Politico broached the issue to one CGI meeting participant who works in the region, he stalked off. Another participant who witnessed the exchange urged Politico to refer to "the Southern Provinces" of Morocco, not the Western Sahara, explaining "you don't use those words here. Those are fighting words."

Jeb Bush Taunts Hillary Clinton Over Not Taking Questions // NYT // Michael Barbaro - May 14, 2015

RENO, Nev. — Jeb Bush has a pointed message for Hillary Rodham Clinton: I'm willing to face tough questions. You're not.

"You can't script your way to the presidency," Mr. Bush said of Mrs. Clinton at a stop in Reno on Wednesday.

Fielding questions from residents, Mr. Bush repeatedly mocked Mrs. Clinton for avoiding formats in which she might encounter unexpected questions from potential voters and reporters. Those are the kind of formats, Mr. Bush suggested, that he relishes and seeks out.

"I was watching Fox last night," Mr. Bush said. "Somebody had actually counted up the times that Hillary Clinton had been asked a question. I think she's been asked six times by the press. In public settings, I don't know that she's been asked any questions."

He added, "I've been asked hundreds of questions both from the press and from people."

Expanding upon his critique, Mr Bush said, "Everybody else does speak to the press and have town hall meetings where they aren't scripted."

"That's part of the process. You can't script your way to the presidency — put yourself in a protective bubble and never interact with people, only talk to people who totally agree with you. It's not going to work."

Mr. Bush brought up Mrs. Clinton again by poking fun at a long-winded question from one man in the audience.

"You wouldn't have been able to get it into a Hillary Clinton event," Mr. Bush said.

Nicolle Wallace to Carly Fiorina: Hands off Hillary // Politico // Glenn Thrush - May 14, 2015

Nicolle Wallace, co-host of The View and longtime aide to Jeb and George W. Bush, thinks GOP hopeful Carly Fiorina should lay off of Hillary Clinton, the only other woman to enter the 2016 race so far.

Fiorina, the conservative former CEO of Hewlett-Packard and failed California Senate candidate, opened up her long-shot campaign for the Republican presidential campaign with a sharp attack on Clinton – and has been lambasting the former secretary of state for months.

"Mrs. Clinton, name an accomplishment," Fiorina said at the Conservative Political Action Conference earlier this year – and when Clinton released her announcement video in April, Fiorina responded with a Facebook jab, remarking, "She's not the woman for the White House."

"Her role in the Republican field has been to be the most sort of strident critic of Hillary Clinton's, which is interesting to me as well. Why does that fall to a woman?" Wallace told chief political correspondent Glenn Thrush during a taping of this week's POLITICO podcast.

"You know, I don't want to be the chick police, but I think that Carly will go far by broadening the attack to everything that's wrong with the liberal approach as opposed to being the thorn in Hillary Clinton's side," added

Wallace, who has been making the rounds promoting her new novel, “Madame President,” which she calls a “fantasy” in which women also serve as defense secretary and White House chief of staff.

“She runs the risk of having it look personal,” Wallace added. “But it’s certainly up to her, if she thinks she’s found her niche as the No. 1 Hillary Clinton critic, I’m sure she’ll get a lot of attention.”

Wallace, who worked on the McCain-Palin campaign, noted that Clinton refused to pointedly attack Palin – even after being asked to do so by members of Obama’s male-dominated inner circle; she said that Palin returned the favor by pulling her punches against Clinton.”

She predicted the current spate of stories about questionable fundraising by the Clinton family foundation – and the candidate’s use of a “homebrew” email server to avoid State Department-mandated disclosure rules — wouldn’t have much of a long term effect. “No one thinks they don’t do shady things, but it’s like the cake has been put in the oven: It’s cooked for 40 minutes, it rose, it’s on the counter already. You can’t change the cake … It’s the Clinton cake. It’s what’s in it, it’s what people know is in it, and they eat it anyway,” she added.

There is one thing that could sink the Clintons, according to Wallace: Detailed reporting on a serious schism between the former first family and the current one.

“She and the Obama White House really, really hated each other,” Wallace said. If that came out, “I think that would confound a lot of Democrats,” she added.

Hillary Clinton Pens Beautiful Letter To Lesbian Couple Featured In Her Campaign Announcement // Huffington Post // JamesMichael Nichols - May 14, 2015

2016 presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton made another display of solidarity this week with the lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender (LGBT) community by penning a beautiful letter to the lesbian couple featured in her campaign announcement video.

Kassie Thornton and Christy Spitzer opened their mailbox this week to discover the letter from Clinton, which thanked the pair for their involvement in the video and for their involvement with the lives and struggles of queer youth. Spitzer was a producer on MTV's "It Gets Better" specials, programs that enhanced the visibility and stories of young LGBT individuals."It's not every day that you open your mailbox to find a letter of gratitude, love, and support from the potential first female president of the U.S. We felt so honored, touched, and downright humbled," Spitzer and Thornton told The Huffington Post. "We are blown away that she is a heartfelt supporter of the 'It Gets Better Project,' and is aware how important their powerful message is. The organization does positive things for many young people all over the world!"

The couple was especially moved by Clinton's well wishes for their upcoming nuptials. Spitzer and Thornton told The Huffington Post they "hope she can come celebrate our love and future with us and our loved ones," joining another same-sex couple featured in the announcement video in inviting Clinton to attend their wedding.

"For Ms. Clinton to thank us for being part of her video announcement and to know that we are getting married [in June] is just unbelievable," Spitzer and Thornton said. "Simply amazing!! Like screaming out loud amazing! We hope she can come and celebrate our love and future with us and our loved ones! And we hope she uses her plus one wisely!"

According to NewNowNext, Spitzer and Thornton met four years ago while both living in New York City. Did you miss the original announcement video featuring the happy couple? Check it out below.

Q: How much of a factor will Hillary Clinton's gender be in the 2016 presidential race? // National Journal //
Sarah Mimms – May 15, 2015

DEMOCRATS (82 VOTES)

A lot: 43%

Some: 48%

Very little: 8%

None: 1%

A lot

"Just because we had an historic barrier-breaking presidential candidate the last two times doesn't make this any less significant."

"There is a huge constituency that wants to see the ultimate glass ceiling broken."

"College campuses are really excited about her in large part because they think it's time for a woman president."

"The GOP just can't help itself when it comes to women's issues, from pay to health, and they are certain to become a gaffe-factory if she's the nominee."

"Own it this time, Hill."

Some

"As a contrast against a mostly male Republican field, it will help, though other factors are vastly more important."

"There are a couple generations of women ready for this ... and they will be a force behind the candidate; will it be enough to offset the hate?"

"A contributing factor—more positive than negative—but doesn't replace her need to present her own vision of the nation."

"There are voters that will absolutely vote for her based on her gender, but it's more likely there are a lot more men that will vote against her because she is a woman."

Very little

"The social-science research is very clear that the gender of the candidates is not a predictor of the vote. The voters most excited about a woman candidate are female Democrats, who would vote for whomever the Democratic Party nominates."

Some: 46%

Very little: 7%

None: 1%

A lot

"It's not a factor—it's the only factor."

"A lot if GOP nominates a white guy; none if they nominate a minority or a woman."

"Breaking the glass ceiling is her strongest suit—if she were a man, this would be a far different race."

"You can bet that the Clinton fortress will include arguing to vote against her is to be anti-woman."

"If Bill Clinton had a brother with a lackluster record of achievement, a penchant for secrecy, limited political skills, and low likability, he would not be the Democrats' only option."

"If female voters turn on her, she's done."

"As Republicans tack harshly to the past, especially in support of restrictions on reproduction rights and marriage equality, the country will again likely view the election of a 'first' as a watershed moment for America's future."

Some

"But not as much as she'd like."

"There's undoubtedly a segment of women [for whom] this is the deciding factor."

"There's always a thirst for 'firsts,' but [Obama] has nearly quenched it."

"She's run before and been a major national player for 25 years. The novelty has worn off."

Hillary's Got A Friend: James Taylor Backs Clinton For President // Daily Caller // Kaitlan Collins - May 14, 2015

In an interview Thursday, James Taylor said he thinks Hillary Clinton is the "public servant" who can bring the country together, and that he's backing her for president.

"Aside from the fact that she's a woman running, she's the right person," the 67-year-old said. "The whole point — black or white, male or female, gay or straight, Christian, Jewish, Muslim, atheist — it doesn't matter what these other connections are."

He also said that Obama is his "favorite, favorite" president, and said he had "a tough time" during the Bush-Cheney administration.

"I had a hard time accepting that that administration represented me because I don't think they did," Taylor said. "I've been watching politics since Eisenhower and Adlai Stevenson, when dinosaurs roamed the Earth, and Obama is my favorite, favorite president."

"I am just thankful for every day that he's in office. I am so proud that he represents my country and I think he represents me — I think he represents the America that I know."

Taylor performed at the Democratic National Convention in 2012, and also sang "America the Beautiful" at Obama's second inauguration.

Hillary Clinton's litmus test for Supreme Court nominees: a pledge to overturn Citizens United // WaPo // Matea Gold and Anne Gearan - May 14, 2015

Hillary Clinton told a group of her top fundraisers Thursday that if she is elected president, her nominees to the Supreme Court will have to share her belief that the court's 2010 Citizens United decision must be overturned, according to people who heard her remarks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's emphatic opposition to the ruling, which allowed corporations and unions to spend unlimited sums on independent political activity, garnered the strongest applause of the afternoon from the more than 200 party financiers gathered in Brooklyn for a closed-door briefing from the Democratic candidate and her senior aides, according to some of those present.

"She got major applause when she said would not name anybody to the Supreme Court unless she has assurances that they would overturn" the decision, said one attendee, who, like others, requested anonymity to describe the private session.

If the make-up of the court does not change by 2017, four of the justices will be 78 years of age or older by the time the next president is inaugurated.

Clinton also reiterated her support for a constitutional amendment that would overturn Citizens United, a long-shot effort that is nonetheless popular among Democratic activists.

"She said she is going to do everything she can," the attendee said. "She was very firm about this – that this Supreme Court decision is just a disaster."

A campaign spokesman did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Clinton has made overhauling the current campaign finance system one of the major planks of her campaign, even as she has tacitly endorsed the efforts of two big-money super PACs working to help get her elected in 2016 -- Priorities USA Action and Correct the Record. Advisers have said that they cannot reject such vehicles when they are being vigorously embraced by the Republican field.

The former secretary of state spoke and took questions for about 45 minutes in a converted warehouse on a pier in Brooklyn's Red Hook neighborhood, with sweeping waterfront views of the Manhattan skyline and the Statue of Liberty. The fundraisers on hand for the meeting -- a mix of longtime Clinton backers and bundlers who played major roles in the campaigns of President Obama -- had all raised at least $27,000 for her campaign.

In response to questions from the group, Clinton spoke about the need for renewable energy and strongly endorsed Obama’s free community college plan.

She avoided taking a position on the controversial Trans-Pacific Partnership trade accord, saying she first wants to see what comes out of Congress.

Afterward, Clinton stayed and shook hands for 45 minutes. There was no sense that old Clinton loyalists had higher ranking than newer supporters, attendees said. “She spent time with every single person -- new friends and old friends equally," said a second participant.

Hillary Clinton Enlists Bigger-Name Backers in Novel Ways // NYT // Maggie Haberman - May 14, 2015

In previous presidential election cycles, campaigns have sent out press releases that screamed the news of endorsements received. In 2008, when Hillary Rodham Clinton was the considered the early front-runner, endorsements were a gauge of support used by reporters and others.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This time around, the press releases blaring about supporters have not come to pass. But Mrs. Clinton's campaign is approaching endorsements differently. They're not promoting support every time it hits — an act that could be construed as adding to a sense of inevitability.

Instead, the campaign's endorsers are focusing on organizing in their states. In Minnesota, Gov. Mark Dayton has quietly endorsed Mrs. Clinton but is focused on getting people to knock on doors and sign up supporters. He hosted an organizing meeting on Monday night, where, according to reports, he told people they "haven't lived until you've gone door-knocking in Iowa in January."

The same was true in Ohio, where former Gov. Ted Strickland, a current United States Senate candidate and a staunch supporter of Mrs. Clinton in the 2008 campaign, has tried to rally activists and headlined organizing meetings. So has Representative Ed Perlmutter of Colorado, former Representative Russ Carnahan of Missouri, and officials in Massachusetts and Rhode Island.

In Georgia, there was a kickoff event last week with some of Mrs. Clinton's supporters.

The goal is to mobilize her supporters, simultaneously building up support in all 50 states but engaging people willing to visit the early-voting states like Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina to draw voters out early next year in the caucuses and primaries.

The Brooklyn Democratic Party Has Endorsed Hillary Clinton // Observer // Ross Barkan - May 14, 2015

The Brooklynite mayor may not be ready for Hillary, but the Brooklyn Democratic machine sure is.

In a sudden decision last night, the Brooklyn Democratic Party's executive committee voted unanimously to endorse Hillary Clinton for president. There was only one abstention.

The motion to take the vote was made by Lew Fidler, a Democratic district leader and former city councilman.

"Proud to say it was my motion," Mr. Fidler said in an email. "I think that makes us the first county in!"

Indeed, no other county organization in the city has formerly endorsed Ms. Clinton. The vote to back the former New York senator and secretary of state was not initially planned, according to one attendee. The Democrats had gathered at the United Progressive Democratic Club, the home club of Assemblyman William Colton, in Bath Beach to discuss other matters.

But Ms. Fidler's sudden motion was received warmly. Ms. Clinton, whose campaign headquarters are in Downtown Brooklyn, is the unquestioned front-runner for the Democratic nomination. She is expected to carry heavily Democratic New York State.

The Kings County Democrats don't have the clout it did decades ago, though it remains the largest organization–in terms of the number of registered Democrats it presides over–in America.

Still, the Democrats are spurning one of their own. Ms. Clinton's only primary challenge so far is from Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, a native Brooklynite. Mr. Sanders grew up in Brooklyn and attended James Madison High School, the alma mater of Hillary backer Sen. Charles Schumer.

After college, he moved to Vermont to begin his political career elsewhere.

Hillary Clinton Woos Donors Visiting Campaign Headquarters // ABC News // Lis Lerer, Associated Press - May 14, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton promised her most loyal supporters Thursday she will present a more authentic version of herself during her 2016 campaign for president than she did eight years ago.

Clinton told a group of several hundred "Hillstarters," donors who have raised at least $27,000 for her campaign, that she had learned from her failed run in 2008.

Asked by one whether voters would see the Clinton who came to tears in a New Hampshire restaurant when asked how she managed to stay upbeat, the former secretary of state said she plans to find ways to show more of her personal side.

"Hillary said, 'Well, that's really on me to make sure I get enough rest, to make sure I think and reflect, and (that) I don't micromanage too much,'" said former Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, who attended the event at a banquet hall in Brooklyn with views of the Statue of Liberty.

Bayh said he and other donors at the meeting had noticed a change in Clinton since her previous run for the White House. "There's something in some ways about being unsuccessful that can be liberating," Bayh said. "She's embraced this, in a joyful spirit."

Clinton encouraged the group of donors to find others who had not yet given to her campaign, Bayh said, but she didn't make a plug for them to give money to Priorities Action USA, the super PAC backing her candidacy. Yet Clinton also noted such outside groups were "sprouting up like mushrooms" on the Republican side, he said.

Lunch was not on the day's itinerary — an effort by campaign manager Robby Mook to demonstrate the campaign's frugal style to the people who will pay for it. Bayh and the other donors got a series of briefings on polling, strategy and communications, along with a tour of Clinton's campaign headquarters.

There was no mention of the recent criticism of the Clinton Family Foundation and the tens of millions of dollars in speaking fees collected by former President Bill Clinton while his wife was secretary of state, aside from pollster Joel Benenson's note that Clinton's numbers remain steady despite a "couple tough news cycles."

There was also no discussion of her potential Republican opponents, whoses support was described as "static" by Clinton's staff, Bayh said.

Clinton's stop at the fundraising event was her first visit to Brooklyn since formally launching her campaign last month. She also spent time at her campaign headquarters, where she spent an hour mingling with staff who have recently joined her operation. Clinton told the dozens of new aides that while winning is important, she also wants them to "have fun," said spokesman Nick Merrill.

While in the neighborhood, she stopped at a pizza shop, a toy store and a local nonprofit. She chatted with customers, ordered a salad and purchased two rompers and a children's book for her granddaughter, Charlotte.

Next week, Clinton will return to more politically competitive terrain, with stops planned in Iowa and New Hampshire.

Hey Brooklyn, Hillary Clinton has arrived // Politico // Annie Karni - May 14, 2015

On her first trip to Brooklyn since declaring her candidacy, Hillary Clinton bought two rompers and a children's book and had a salad at a local pizza shop.

Ahead of a finance meeting in Red Hook for Hillstarters — fundraisers who raised $27,000 from 10 donors — Clinton made a visit to her campaign headquarters at 1 Pierrepont Plaza, where the campaign staff currently occupies one full floor of the building. (The campaign is expected to eventually expand to two floors of rented space there.)

Clinton shook hands with staffers who had yet to meet her and reconnected with some familiar faces from her previous campaigns. She told the group: "It's important to win, but it's also important to have fun," according to spokesman Nick Merrill.

After about an hour of hand-shaking, Clinton took a short walking and shopping tour of Brooklyn Heights.

She visited the toy store Area Kids, where she bought a romper, presumably for her grandchild, and the local nonprofit Brooklyn Women's Exchange Inc., where she bought a second romper and the children's book "Simpson's Sheep Won't Go To Sleep." For lunch, she had a salad from Monty Q's, a pizza place.

Clinton was being filmed by a campaign operative and was accompanied by longtime aide Huma Abedin and Merrill.

She arrived at the Red Hook finance meeting just after 3 p.m. in her "Scooby" van and did not take questions from the media as she entered.

Hillary Clinton just had her first big outing in Brooklyn // Business Insider // Colin Campbell and Hunter Walker - May 14, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton dropped by at least two small businesses near her campaign headquarters in Brooklyn, New York on Thursday afternoon.

Employees who saw Clinton told Business Insider she purchased a salad, an iced tea, and a dress for her granddaughter. Both of the businesses visited by Clinton are located on Montague Street in Brooklyn Heights.

According to the New York Times' Maggie Haberman, who tweeted about the walk, it was Clinton's first visit to the neighborhood near her new office since she announced her presidential campaign last month. Clinton stopped by the toy store Area Kids and the pizza place Monty Q's.

Clinton Santana, an employee at Area Kids, told Business Insider that Clinton was accompanied by her top aide, Huma Abedin, and several photographers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"She was in here for about five to ten minutes," Santana said of Clinton.

According to Santana, while she was at Area, Clinton posed for a picture with the staff and purchased a "Royal Flower Wrap Neck Dress" from Nordstrom's "Tea Collection." The dress is sized for children from the ages of 12 to 16 months. Santana said his co-worker informed him Clinton purchased the dress for her granddaughter, Charlotte, who was born last September.

At Monty Q's, an employee named Edmonda said Clinton "got a salad."

"No pizza for her, she couldn't have no pizza," Edmonda said.

Clinton also got a beverage.

"We had some fresh tea made, so she got one of those, an ice cold tea," Edmonda said.

The restaurant's staff were apparently quite pleased to meet Clinton.

"We were so excited to see her. ... She was very kind, very nice," Edmonda said. "She actually asked the owner to take a picture with all the staff."

The Monty Q's staff may have gotten a picture with Clinton, but according to Edmonda, the presidential candidate did not leave a tip. However, Clinton rejected the restaurant's offer of a free meal.

"We offered her to get a free salad, but she wanted to pay for it, so she had somebody pay for it," Edmonda explained.

During Clinton's walk on Montague Street, multiple people snapped pictures of her and posted them to social media.

Hillary Clinton explores Brooklyn Heights neighborhood // Capital New York // Dana Rubinstein - May 14, 2015

On Thursday afternoon, a Brooklyn Heights pizzeria got an unannounced visit from Hillary Clinton. She ordered a salad.

“We weren’t surprised,” said George Chamoun, the owner of Monty Q's, the 16-year-old brick oven pizzeria on Montague Street, just a few blocks from Clinton’s One Pierrepont offices. "We figured she was going to be around.”

According to the Transport Workers Union, which has offices nearby and shared a photo with Capital, Clinton arrived around 2:30 p.m.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Chamoun said she ordered a romaine lettuce salad known as “Fire and Spice” which, according to the menu, retails for $7.50 and comes with grilled chicken, black beans, corn, grape tomatoes, tortilla strips and a “spicy cream poblano dressing.”

Chamoun offered to buy it for her. She declined. But she took pictures with the staff and was, he said, “very nice.”

He also thinks she's got a "pretty presidential" background.

But that doesn't mean he’s voting for her, at least not yet.

“I’m on the fence right now,” said Chamoun, who wouldn’t say with which party he’s registered. “There’s a lot of things that I would like to see move another way before I could really vote for her.”

What are his concerns?

“The phone things and the text messages and the emailgate, that's bothering a lot of people," he said."I don't think I'm the only one that's bothered with it ... What's in there? Is there something that she’s hiding? Is there something that the public she should know about?"

A spokesman for Clinton had no immediate comment.

Hillary Clinton adds third Chicago fundraiser: Hits hometown May 19, 20 // Chicago Sun Times // Lynn Sweet - May 14, 2015

WASHINGTON – Not wanting to leave any campaign cash on the table, 2016 Democratic White House hopeful Hillary Clinton is adding a third fundraiser to her Chicago schedule when she hits her hometown next week.

Manilow is a member of Chicago’s Crown family. A cousin Susan Crown, is a major fund-raiser for Jeb Bush.

The addition according to an invitation obtained by the Chicago Sun-Times: A $2,700-per-person May 19 reception will be at the Chicago home of Barbara Manilow, a longtime major donor and fund-raiser for President Barack Obama and other Democrats.

Last week I reported Clinton comes home on May 20 for major fundraisers at the homes of two longtime supporters, business executives Fred Eychaner and J.B. Pritzker and his wife, M.K.

The invitations for those events, obtained by the Chicago Sun-Times, said “Please join us for a conversation with Hillary Rodham Clinton in support of Hillary for America.”

Jeremy Hallahan, the Illinois Finance Director for Hillary for America in an e-mail to prospects about the added Manilow event said, “It is very exciting to have our first Hillary event in Chicago in less than two weeks. We had such a strong response, and spots are filing up so quickly that we are adding another stop in Chicago! On Tuesday, May 19th we are adding an additional reception with Hillary Clinton. If you or your friends cannot make the 20th, please join us on the 19th!”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The events are the first Chicago visits for Clinton since she declared for president last month.

The fundraiser at the home of Eychaner, one of the major Democratic donors in the nation, is from 4:30 p.m. to 6:30 p.m.

J.B. Pritzker is a longtime Clinton backer. He was a major supporter and fundraiser when Clinton ran the first time in 2008, even as his sister, now Commerce Secretary Penny Pritzker, was the national finance chair for President Barack Obama. The Pritzker event will run from 6:30 p.m. to 8:30 p.m.

The ticket price is $2,700 per person. Anyone who raises $27,000 becomes a “Hillstarter.” Hosts of the event are being asked to raise $50,000.

The 270 is a reference to the number of electoral votes needed to become president.

Clinton organizing meeting in Newton // Boston Globe // Frank Phillips - May 14, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton’s presidential campaign is moving quickly to get Massachusetts activists behind her candidacy, a move some see as an attempt to send a message to Senator Elizabeth Warren, who is under heavy pressure from supporters across the country to jump into the Democratic race and challenge Clinton.

The latest is a big get-together of pro-Hillary Democratic activists Sunday in the liberal Newton-Brookline-Somerville-Cambridge nexus, a hotbed of Warren-mania. The event will be at the American Legion Nonantum Post 440 in Newton, a large venue for such an early event billed as grassroots organizing.

The Warren folks dismiss the notion that the Clinton campaign-sponsored get-together is designed to muscle the Massachusetts senator on her own turf. For one, they insist Warren is not and will not be a presidential candidate. That Clinton is doing this sort of field work across the country, in almost every state, also undercuts the theory.

Still, Clinton’s foray into the home states of three Democratic long-shot challengers — Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island, Martin O’Malley of Maryland, and Bernie Sanders of Vermont — has underscored reports that she is leaving nothing to chance in rounding up the party’s grassroots activists early.

Here in Massachusetts, her campaign has hired Erik Balsbaugh, an experienced field organizer for her in 2008 and for John Kerry’s presidential bid in 2004, to engage activitists in these early stages

Hillary Clinton books second trip to Iowa // USA Today // Jennifer Jacobs - May 14, 2015

A month after the debut Iowa visit of her 2016 presidential campaign, Democrat Hillary Clinton will return to the first-in-the-nation voting state next week.

Clinton will be in the state on Monday and Tuesday, spokeswoman Lily Adams told Iowa reporters Wednesday night. Campaign aides didn’t release the names of towns Clinton will visit, but said she will do small events similar to her previous trip that will give voters one-on-one time with her for questions and idea sharing.

On April 13, the leading Democratic presidential contender came straight to Iowa after formally announcing her candidacy the day before. Instead of flying in a private jet from her home state of New York, she rode in a van nicknamed Scooby because it reminded her of the van in the 1970s TV cartoon "Scooby Doo."

The first official event of Clinton's presidential campaign was in Monticello, where she spelled out "four big fights" she wants to pursue — create more jobs, strengthen families, get secret money out of politics and keep the nation secure. She also said government aid for college costs and economic fairness are among her priorities.

"I want to stand up and fight for people so they cannot just get by, but they get ahead and stay ahead," Clinton said.

Clinton's campaign aides intentionally designed her three-day Iowa swing to be a listening tour, staged in small, casual settings, mostly out of the glare of press scrutiny. Her strategists said she will take a more humble approach this time than during her unsuccessful 2008 presidential race, casting the focus away from herself and onto ordinary Americans.

No candidate trip in the 2016 presidential cycle to date has drawn as much attention in the traditional media or on social media, where people were tracking her journey and guessing where she was going next.

In late April, Clinton penned a thank-you note to Iowans published in the opinion section of The Des Moines Register. "I'll be back soon. Thanks for having me, Iowa," she wrote.

Republicans responded to the news of Clinton's upcoming Iowa visit by bringing up controversies over Clinton's use of a personal email server to conduct U.S. State Department business out of the public eye, and donations foreign governments made to the Clinton Foundation despite the conflict of interest for the Clinton-led state department.

"Instead of addressing the concerns of everyday Americans, Hillary Clinton continues to dodge the growing number of questions surrounding shady foreign donations and her secret email server," said Fred Brown, spokesman for the Republican National Committee.

Hillary Clinton to return to NH on May 21 // WMUR // May 14, 2015

Hillary Clinton will be back in New Hampshire next week for her second visit since announcing her candidacy for president in mid-April.

A Clinton campaign official told WMUR.com the Democratic presidential frontrunner will be in the state on May 21, with details of the visit yet to be disclosed. She will be in New Hampshire on the same day that former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush wraps up a two-day visit.

The Clinton campaign official said the events will be small-scale, similar to those she has done on previous trips to New Hampshire and other states, as part of the "ramp up" phase of the campaign.

According to the campaign, the events will be designed to give Granite Staters the opportunity to ask her questions and share ideas.

Earlier Thursday, the Clinton campaign announced she will return to first-caucus state Iowa on Monday and Tuesday, May 18 and 19. She has also visited the early-voting states of Nevada recently and is slated to go to South Carolina on May 27.

In Texas, Clinton Campaign Revs Up // The Texas Tribune // Patrick Svitek - May 13, 2015

LLANO — The dozen or so Hillary Clinton supporters gathered here late Tuesday had no illusions that ruby-red Texas would play a key role in electing the next Democratic president. They acknowledged they may get sent to other states to phone bank and block walk, and they were told — repeatedly — not to expect Clinton's campaign to open a brick-and-mortar outpost in the Lone Star State anytime soon.

Yet they held out hope that the former secretary of state could put up a fight in Texas, where Democrats are desperately looking for a boost after devastating losses in last year's statewide elections.

"She may not win this state," said Terry Adkins, a former union official who recalls registering voters with the Clintons decades ago in the Rio Grande Valley. "But I do believe she's going to really scare some Republicans."

The meeting at the back of the Llano Public Library — held on a dreary evening in the heart of the Hill Country, 90 minutes outside Texas' liberal refuge of Austin — highlighted the Clinton campaign's first public efforts to build an organization in a state that rejected President Obama by double-digit margins in 2008 and 2012. The campaign is decisively concentrating on the primary in Texas and elsewhere, reflective of a humble approach to a presidential race in which Clinton has long been presumed as the Democratic nominee.

Still, as they rally donors and volunteers, some Texas Democrats cannot help but imagine a general election in which Clinton shakes the party out of its statewide slump.

"I'm not giving up on the general election in Texas because I think she's the kind of candidate who could build on the work Battleground Texas and other groups have done and make a credible showing," said Carrin Patman, a Houston trial lawyer who is helping raise money for the campaign. "It may sound quixotic, but I wouldn't rule out her putting Texas in play in 2016."

So far, the campaign's most visible outreach in Texas has centered on what it calls "old-school organizing." It has dispatched a full-time paid staffer to Texas through the end of May, part of a broader push to start building a ground game in all 50 states. The staffer, Manfred Mecoy, has Texas roots as a UT-Dallas graduate and Fort Worth native, and he comes to the state with several years of organizing experience in North Carolina and Ohio. His boss is Lance Orchid, who serves as one of four temporary grassroots regional directors.

Mecoy is among the activists leading a series of so-called grassroots organizing meetings this week — Tuesday in Llano and Fort Worth, Wednesday in Austin and Thursday in Dallas. The gatherings are more or less serving as listening sessions, with supporters getting the opportunity to weigh in on what shape they think the campaign should take in Texas.

At the Llano meeting, for example, supporters gathered in a circle and shared their answers to questions on a worksheet including "What national issues do you believe are most important to Texans such as yourself?" and "What presence do you think Hillary for America should have in Texas during the primary election campaign?" The attendees, some eager to immediately get involved in the campaign, were told to sit tight as the powers-that-be chart a long-term plan for Texas.

Clinton allies in the state say the early organization shows the campaign means it when it says it wants to earn every vote. They point out it is unusual — if not unheard of — for a Democratic presidential campaign to install a state-level organizer in a red state like Texas, let alone 10 months before the primary and without a serious opponent.

"She is taking nothing for granted," said Dallas attorney Regina Montoya, noting that Clinton's operation is not assuming a general election berth. "She is here to ensure she does well in the Texas primary."

"She's starting now, and I think that's why you see her working as hard as she is and everyone else working as hard as they are," Montoya added.

As the campaign's organizing in Texas is ramping up, so is its finance operation. Jennifer Ajluni, the former finance director of the Texas Democratic Party, is overseeing the campaign's fundraising in Texas. Meanwhile, Austin-based consultant Yaël Ouzillou is in charge of fundraising in the South Central region that includes Texas. She played a similar role on Clinton's 2008 campaign.

Right now, the campaign is focused on recruiting so-called "Hillstarters," donors who can raise $2,700 — the maximum limit for the primary — from 10 different people. On Tuesday, the campaign is sending national political director Amanda Renteria and chief digital strategist Teddy Goff to Austin to hold a private strategy session with current and prospective Hillstarters.

A familiar cast of deep-pocketed Texans are expected to open their wallets for the campaign and have already ponied up for Ready for Hillary. Houston trial lawyers Steve and Amber Mostyn were among the founding members of the group's national finance council, while its co-chairs include prominent Democratic donors such as McAllen developer Alonzo Cantu, CarMax co-founder Austin Ligon and Fort Worth investor Robert Patton, who co-owns the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Aiding the Clinton campaign is the months-long efforts of Ready for Hillary, which held fundraisers and public events across the state while building a massive list of early backers of a Clinton campaign. Garry Mauro, a former land commissioner who worked for Ready for Hillary in Texas, recently said it ended up raising over $600,000 in the state and signing up more than 200,000 volunteers.

"So we've got a good, solid base," Mauro said on The Ticket, the Texas Tribune/KUT podcast on the 2016 presidential race. "It's the only campaign I've ever been involved in — the day she announces, we've got 200,000 volunteers, you know, on our internet, ready to go, ready to put bumper stickers on. So that's a nice head start."

For Texas Democrats, it remains an open question how the campaign will mesh with the network of state-level groups working to turn the state blue, especially as those groups find their footing after getting crushed up and down the ballot in 2014. Battleground Texas Executive Director Jenn Brown said in a statement Tuesday that it is "too soon to tell what things will look like in Texas in 2016 or how Battleground Texas and its supporters will interact with the president campaign."

Clinton's fans in Texas nonetheless see Battleground as an eventual partner for the campaign. Some believe the benefits of its work last year will not be evident until a presidential election cycle, when Democrats tend to turn out more than they do in midterm elections.

On Tuesday night in Llano, Clinton backers were already floating their expectations for Clinton's performance in the general election. John Lightfoot, president of the Llano County Democratic Party Club, said any prediction has to take into account the reality of Texas' solid-red electorate.

"If we can get 30 or 35 percent [turnout] and if we can get a good 30 to 40 percent of that for Hillary," he said,"I think we've done a good job."

Democrats 2016: Sanders Now Clinton's Chief Rival // University of Virginia, Center for Politics // Geoffrey Skelley - May 14, 2015

"Inevitable." That's the word often used to describe Hillary Clinton and the 2016 Democratic nomination. Can anyone beat her? Anything's possible, but the odds appear quite low. Still, her most threatening intraparty opposition could prove to be a man who isn't even technically a Democrat (yet, anyway): independent Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, a self-identified "democratic socialist." We see him as a potential thorn in Clinton's side, and to reflect that, we are moving Sanders to the top of the non-Clinton tier in our presidential rankings for Democrats.

Some progressive activists are still hoping Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-MA) will get into the race. However, while she reportedly met with some members of the "Draft Warren" movement in late April, it still seems very unlikely that the Bay State senator will run. The idea of New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio (D) running, and doing so credibly, is even harder to fathom than a Warren candidacy: He's only less than a year and a half into his first term, and already he is controversial and has just a 44% job approval rating (according to Tuesday's Quinnipiac survey).

Sanders is in a position to fill the void to Clinton's left, possibly attracting voters who are skeptical of Clinton because of her ties to Wall Street and her perceived hawkishness on foreign policy issues. Because of his issue positions and personality, Sanders could be an attractive candidate for liberals who want someone to press Clinton on topics like income inequality, free trade, and her Senate vote in favor of authorizing the Iraq War (although that vote is now more than a decade old).

On the issues, Sanders was the third-most liberal senator in the last Congress, behind only Warren and Sen. Tammy Baldwin (D-WI). His presidential announcement speech highlighted his goal of creating "an economy that works for all people rather than a small number of billionaires" and denounced the role of money in politics, particularly the post-Citizens United campaign finance system. While a member of the House in 2002, Sanders voted against the Iraq War and is a leading opponent of the Trans-Pacific Partnership agreement and other free trade deals. He has also favored nixing the Keystone XL Pipeline project, a matter about which Clinton has remained publicly undecided. These are all positions that will win him support among progressive and labor groups.

But along with his policy views, Sanders' personal characteristics may also make him a potent "protest" option for liberals in the Democratic primary. He is assertive and knows precisely what he believes in –and is unabashed in expressing himself. Moreover, Sanders is unlikely to have delusions of grandeur — he knows he isn't going to be the presidential nominee — so he has nothing to lose by pushing Clinton hard.

Looking back at past presidential campaigns, a point of comparison for Sanders is Eugene McCarthy, the Democratic Minnesota senator and three-time presidential candidate. McCarthy ran against President Lyndon Johnson in the 1968 New Hampshire primary and stunned everyone by nearly defeating the incumbent. The outcome spurred Sen. Robert F. Kennedy to announce his own candidacy and led to Johnson's stunning decision to not seek reelection. Like Sanders, McCarthy had an independent streak, and in fact McCarthy ran for the presidency in 1976 as an independent. Democrats are relieved that Sanders has personally pledged not to bolt like McCarthy and play a Ralph Nader-like role (a la 2000) in the 2016 general election campaign.

To some extent, Clinton may be okay with Sanders potentially becoming her most serious opponent. Clinton has long known that someone would emerge to make the Democratic primary battle at least a minimal contest for the media to cover. Additionally, plenty of party activists in the early states want some competition in the race. Why not have her main challenger be the very liberal Sanders, someone who will lack the resources and standing to truly threaten her? Clinton also knows that she will need the base to turn out heavily in November 2016, so she has already moved to the left on certain issues, most recently immigration. Whereas someone like ex-Gov. Martin O'Malley (D-MD) fits the profile of a more serious challenger to Clinton (or did at some point), Sanders is a senator from one of the smallest states, is unknown to most Americans, and cannot defeat Clinton, barring incredible unforeseen circumstances.

Speaking of O'Malley, his stock has tumbled in light of the recent events in Baltimore, where he served as mayor prior to becoming governor of Maryland. Criminal justice policies he implemented as mayor, such as zero-tolerance policing, have come under fire from critics who believe they contributed to the long-term problems undergirding the recent riots in Charm City. O'Malley has said he would announce in Baltimore "if" he runs for president, a very likely move at this point, but this location won't provide an ideal campaign backdrop. Although he has to own and defend his record as mayor and governor if he's to remain a credible candidate, Baltimore's unrest can and will be used against O'Malley. For the time being, he is positioned behind Sanders in our rankings.

While we have shifted our Democratic rankings this week, we also have one change on the Republican side of the ledger: Gov. Rick Snyder (R-MI) announced last week that he will not seek the 2016 GOP nomination for president, meaning that we can again remove him from the Crystal Ball list. We had actually taken Snyder out of our rankings weeks ago but brought him back in our last Republican update because of numerous reports suggesting he would run. But now that he's explicitly said he won't, "one tough nerd" exits our rankings. That leaves a still-staggering 19 names on our Republican list, which you can see here.

Hillary Clinton wants to put Harriet Tubman on the $20 bill // Business Insider // Leslie Larson - May 14, 2015

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton has added a new issue to her presidential campaign platform: replacing President Andrew Jackson on the $20 bill with abolitionist Harriet Tubman.

Clinton tweeted on Thursday in support of making Tubman the first female face to grace printed US currency.

"Awesome, well deserved—and about time," she tweeted.

With the message, Clinton lent her support to Women on 20s, a movement advocating for more female representation on US currency.

The movement was co-founded by Barbara Howard, who told Business Insider in March that Jackson was a prime candidate for replacement given his "mixed legacy" in support of the forced resettlement of Native Americans in the 1830s.

Tubman was selected in May from a public vote hosted by the group. She was one of 15 famous female candidates under consideration.

Only deceased public figures are eligible to appear on currency, so Clinton was not a nominee herself.

Howard, who had previously worked for Clinton, said in March she hoped Clinton would become president.

"I would support her, but not necessarily on paper money it's very important to honor those women in the past," she said.

WASHINGTON —The woman who hopes to be the first female President wants to ditch Andrew Jackson in favor of placing the first woman on a U.S. banknote — Harriet Tubman.

"Harriet Tubman could be the first woman on the $20 bill. Awesome, well deserved — and about time," Clinton's account tweeted Thursday afternoon.

Activists have been pushing to get a woman on the $20 bill to replace Jackson and recently settled on Tubman over three other women after months of online voting.

The push has been getting support, drawing recent praise from the White House, and a close Clinton ally, Sen. Jeanne Shaheen (D-N.H.), recently introduced legislation to ask the Treasury Department to convene a panel to discuss putting a woman on the bill.

EXCLUSIVE: Bill Clinton's travel schedule eyed for ties to Hillary's time as secretary of state // NY Daily News // Cameron Joseph - May 14, 2015

A conservative group wants to see Bill Clinton's datebook.

The organization Citizens United will release an open letter to the Clinton Foundation, first shared with the Daily News, demanding his travel schedule.

They want to see when he was in countries on foundation business around the same time then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton was in the same places on official government business.

"In light of the fact it's been recently stated that President Clinton will continue to be 'completely focused right now on the foundation,' not only should the Clinton Foundation disclose all of President Clinton's foreign travel from this point forward, but also release details of his foreign travel during Secretary Clinton's time as secretary of state," Citizens United President David Bossie says in the letter to the Clinton Foundation's board chairman.

The letter points to the Clintons' overlapping time in Colombia, highlighted in "Clinton Cash," a book by conservative author Peter Schweizer, as an example of a potential conflict of interest.

Citizens United has long been a Clinton antagonist. And Bossie made it clear that he's looking to embarrass the Clintons with the letter, calling the couple "hypocrites to the highest order."

Bossie cut his teeth as a GOP congressional investigator into the Clintons' finances during the 1990s, and the organization's push to show an anti-Hillary film spurred 2010 the Supreme Court decision that caused a flood of outside money into the political system.

Clinton's campaign declined to comment on the letter, deferring to the Clinton Foundation, which didn't respond to a request for comment.

'Clinton Cash' publisher corrects '7 or 8' inaccurate passages // Politico// Annie Karnia - May 14, 2015

In trying to defuse the potential damage of the buzzy book “Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich,” Hillary Clinton’s campaign and its allies seized on factual errors identified in author Peter Schweizer’s reporting.

Now, at least for Kindle eBook readers, those passages with errors have been deleted or edited in an updated version of the book.

Amazon on Tuesday blasted out an alert to purchasers of the book — which investigates alleged connections between the Clinton Foundation donors and Hillary Clinton’s work at the State Department, and debuted at No. 2 on The New York Times’ best-seller list for the week of May 24 — notifying them that “significant revisions have been made.”

“An updated version of your past Kindle purchase ... is now available,” reads the email. “The updated version contains the following changes: Significant revisions have been made.”

Schweizer corrected “seven or eight” passages that were revealed to be inaccurate after the book was released, according to publisher HarperCollins.

Among them, Schweizer says in the original version of the book that TD Bank, a major shareholder in the Keystone XL pipeline, paid Bill Clinton for speeches and then said it would “begin selling its $1.6 billion worth of shares in the massive but potentially still-born [sic] Keystone XL crude pipeline project” after Hillary Clinton left office. But as his source on the sale of TD Bank’s shares, Schweizer used a press release that was revealed to be fake in 2013.

That passage has been removed from the most recent Kindle version of the book.

Schweizer also appears to have edited a passage in which he claims Bill Clinton was paid $200,000 per speech by Irish billionaire Denis O’Brien for three speaking engagements he delivered in Ireland. The implication was that, while Hillary Clinton’s State Department was giving O’Brien’s company taxpayer money through the Haiti Mobile Money Initiative, “O’Brien was in turn making money for the Clintons.”

But Clinton was not paid personally for those speeches, according to his spokesman. And the Clinton Foundation was paid for just one of the three speeches. The new version deletes any mention that Clinton was paid for those speeches, and edited a claim that Clinton received $225,000 for a speech in Jamaica sponsored in part by O’Brien’s company Digicel. Another edit appears to have been made on the timing of a speech Clinton gave in Jamaica, which was also paid for by O’Brien.

Schweizer’s publisher, HarperCollins, said there was nothing out of the ordinary about the updates made to the Kindle version of the book.

“This is a routine notification that Amazon sends to previous version purchasers whenever there is an updated file,” a HarperCollins spokesperson said in a statement. “The changes that Amazon is referring to as significant are actually quite minor. We made 7-8 factual corrections after the first printing and fixed a technical issue regarding the endnotes. This global fix may have made the changes appear more extensive than they were.”

Schweizer told ABC News last month that he planned to correct some errors in his reporting that had come to light.

'Clinton Cash' Author Slams Stephanopoulos, ABC News for 'Massive Breach of Ethical Standards' // Bloomberg // Joshua Green - May 14, 2015

When Peter Schweizer appeared on This Week on April 26 to promote his new book about the Clintons, he got a skeptical grilling from host George Stephanopoulos. One subject that wasn't raised? The fact that Stephanopoulous has personally contributed $50,000 to the Clinton Foundation, as Politico reported Thursday morning.

With the ABC host's donations suddenly in the spotlight, Schweizer feels he got burned. "Really quite stunned by this," he said in an e-mail. It's "a massive breach of ethical standards. He fairly noted my four months working as a speech writer for George W. Bush. But he didn't disclose this?"

Evidently not. In a statement, Stephanopoulos apologized. An ABC News spokesman told Politico reporter Dylan Byers the network would not take punitive action against its star host: "We accept his apology. It was an honest mistake."

On Thursday, HarperCollins, the publisher of Schweizer's book, Clinton Cash: The Untold Story of How and Why Foreign Governments and Businesses Helped Make Bill and Hillary Rich, announced that it would make "7-8 factual corrections" to the e-book version. Asked to respond, Schweizer said, "The corrections are all minor."

George Stephanopoulos discloses $50,000 contribution to Clinton Foundation // Politico // Dylan Byers - May 14, 2015

ABC News chief anchor George Stephanopoulos has given $50,000 to the Clinton Foundation in recent years, charitable contributions that he did not publicly disclose while reporting on the Clintons or their nonprofit organization, the On Media blog has learned.

In both 2013 and 2014, Stephanopoulos made a $25,000 donation to the 501 nonprofit founded by former President Bill Clinton, the foundation's records show. Stephanopoulos never disclosed this information to viewers, even when interviewing author Peter Schweizer last month about his book "Clinton Cash," which alleges that donations to the foundation may have influenced some of Hillary Clinton's actions as secretary of state.

In a statement to the On Media blog on Thursday, Stephanopoulos apologized and said that he should have disclosed the donations to ABC News and its viewers.

"I made charitable donations to the Foundation in support of the work they're doing on global AIDS prevention and deforestation, causes I care about deeply," he said. "I thought that my contributions were a matter of public record. However, in hindsight, I should have taken the extra step of personally disclosing my donations to my employer and to the viewers on air during the recent news stories about the Foundation. I apologize."

Stephanopoulos is the chief anchor and chief political correspondent for ABC News, as well as the co-anchor of ABC's "Good Morning America" and host of "This Week," its Sunday morning public affairs program. Prior to joining ABC News, he served as communications director and senior adviser for policy and strategy to President Clinton. He also served as communications director on Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In its own statement on Thursday, ABC News said it was standing behind its star anchor.

"As George has said, he made charitable donations to the Foundation to support a cause he cares about deeply and believed his contributions were a matter of public record," the network's statement read. "He should have taken the extra step to notify us and our viewers during the recent news reports about the Foundation. He's admitted to an honest mistake and apologized for that omission. We stand behind him."

ABC News later told the On Media blog that it would not take any punitive action against Stephanopoulos: "We accept his apology," a spokesperson said. "It was an honest mistake."

Sources with knowledge of Stephanopoulos' charitable giving said he gives to dozens of charities every year and that the total sum of these annual contributions is in the millions of dollars. Those sources said that the Clinton Foundation contributions represent a very small percentage of the total.

On the April 26 edition of "This Week," Stephanopoulos interviewed Schweizer and challenged the author's assertions that Hillary Clinton may have committed a crime because there was a "troubling pattern" between donations to the foundation and Clinton's actions as secretary of state.

"We've done investigative work here at ABC News, found no proof of any kind of direct action," the host told Schweizer. "An independent government ethics expert, Bill Allison, of the Sunlight Foundation, wrote this. He said, 'There's no smoking gun, no evidence that she changed the policy based on donations to the foundation.' No smoking gun."

Later in the interview, Stephanopoulos said, "I still haven't heard any direct evidence, and you just said you had no evidence that she intervened here." He also noted that other news organizations that used Schweizer's research "haven't confirmed any evidence of any crime."

Among the more notable revelations to come out of Schweizer's research is the relationship between the Clinton Foundation and Uranium One, a former Canadian mining company that was taken over by Russia in 2013 with U.S. government approval. From 2009 through 2013, Uranium One's chairman donated $2.35 million to the Clinton Foundation.

Hillary Clinton has said that there is "not an inherent conflict of interest" between the foundation donations and her decisions at the State Department. Her campaign has consistently dismissed the accusations as partisan attacks.

ABC anchor sorry for not disclosing Clinton donations // CNN // May 14, 2015

George Stephanopoulos, the chief anchor of ABC News, apologized on Thursday for not telling viewers or his bosses about $75,000 in recent donations to the Clinton Foundation.

The revelations shocked many in the television news industry and prompted stern reactions from a number of prominent Republicans. Within hours, Stephanopoulos came out and said he would recuse himself from ABC's planned Republican presidential primary debate, scheduled to take place next February.

"I don't want to be a distraction," he told CNNMoney, "so I'm not going to moderate that debate."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

However, Stephanopoulos said, "I am going to continue to cover the 2016 campaign."

In a phone interview -- perhaps intended to stem the damage done by the revelations -- Stephanopoulos called the donations a mistake and reiterated his earlier apology.

Stephanopoulos was one of Bill Clinton's closest advisers during Clinton's first term as president. He is now one of the most-respected and best-paid anchors at ABC News.

The network is not taking any disciplinary action against him.

"He made charitable donations to the foundation to support a cause he cares about deeply and believed his contributions were a matter of public record," the network said in a Thursday morning statement.

"He should have taken the extra step to notify us and our viewers during the recent news reports about the Foundation," the network continued. "He's admitted to an honest mistake and apologized for that omission. We stand behind him."

The existence of the donations was first reported by Politico and the Washington Free Beacon on Thursday morning.

ABC initially said Stephanopoulos had donated a total of $50,000 to the foundation, once in 2013 and once in 2014.

Later in the day, he said he'd forgotten about a third donation of $25,000, back in 2012, so the total is actually $75,000.

All the donations were a matter of public record, and represented only a small slice of the anchor's annual charitable giving.

In an initial statement of contrition on Thursday morning, Stephanopoulos said he made the donations "in support of the work they're doing on global AIDS prevention and deforestation, causes I care about deeply."

"I thought that my contributions were a matter of public record," he said. "However, in hindsight, I should have taken the extra step of personally disclosing my donations to my employer and to the viewers on air during the recent news stories about the foundation. I apologize."

After the initial news reports, two Republican candidates for president, Rand Paul and Ted Cruz, said they thought Stephanopoulos should not moderate any 2016 debates.

A number of other Republicans went further and said he should not be involved in any election coverage while Hillary Clinton is a candidate for president.

Conn Carroll, the communications director for Senator Mike Lee, tweeted, "I'm not letting my boss go on ABC until" Stephanopoulos "recuses himself from all 2016 coverage."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As criticism mounted, Stephanopoulos said he regretted not just the lack of disclosure, but the donations themselves.

"I gave the donations for the right reasons, for the best of intentions, to support causes I believe in," he said in the phone interview. "In retrospect, I realize that even though that falls within our guidelines, I should have gone above and beyond that, just to avoid anything that would even raise any possible appearance of a conflict."

"That's why it was a mistake," he said, "and that's why I'm sorry -- to our viewers and to my colleagues."

With regards to his 2016 campaign coverage, he said, "I think I'll be able to prove every single day that I do it with intelligence and fairness, just as I've done for the last 17-plus years."

After stepping down from his White House post in 1996, Stephanopoulos gradually became one of the best-known television news hosts in the United States.

He is currently the co-host of ABC's most lucrative news program, "Good Morning America," and the moderator of the Sunday morning public affairs program "This Week."

Stephanopoulos said he did not recall whether any of his donations were actively solicited by the foundation.

He said his only remaining relationship to the Clintons is a journalistic one.

George Stephanopoulos donations to Clinton Foundation: Immediate crisis for ABC News // WaPo // Erik Wemple - May 14, 2015

ABC News's George Stephanopoulos contributed a total of $50,000 to the Clinton Foundation in 2013 and 2014, according to a report by Politico's Dylan Byers. The donations came in two tranches of $25,000, reported Politico, citing foundation records.

How big a deal is this? Large: Stephanopoulos IS ABC News. Though he doesn't anchor "ABC World News Tonight," he is the network's chief anchor, meaning that he fronts the network in breaking news situations — or just when it matters. More: He is anchor of "Good Morning America" and of "This Week with George Stephanopoulos."

Now for the Clinton Foundation, the family charity of Bill, Hillary and Chelsea Clinton. As numerous reports have shown in recent weeks, the foundation sits at the crossroads of domestic and international power. Big shots who donate to promote the foundation's work in economic development, global health and climate change may also be seeking influence in U.S. politics.

A donation from Stephanopoulos to the Clinton Foundation in any amount constitutes a scandal and an immediate crisis for ABC News. Though the donations in 2013 and 2014 appear to have occurred after Hillary Clinton left the State Department (in early 2013) and before she announced her presidential run (weeks ago), come on: Her inevitability as a candidate for the Democratic presidential nomination has been a Washington fact throughout this period.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now for the defenses. First, from Stephanopoulos:

I made charitable donations to the Foundation in support of the work they're doing on global AIDS prevention and deforestation, a cause I care about deeply. I thought that my contributions were all a matter of public record. However, in hindsight, I should have taken the extra step of personally disclosing my donations to my employer and to the viewers on air during the recent news stories about the Foundation. I apologize.

And from ABC News:

As George has said, he made charitable donations to the Foundation to support a cause he cares about deeply and believed his contributions were a matter of public record. He should have taken the extra step to notify us and our viewers during the recent news reports about the Foundation. He's admitted to an honest mistake and apologized for that omission. We stand behind him.

Those statements are welcome acknowledgments that the donations are serious business. Yet were they really an "honest mistake"? Another way of looking at them is that they were an "honest expression of support" for the ruling family of American Democratic politics. We trust that Stephanopoulos cares about global AIDS prevention and deforestation, and a source familiar with the situation says the donations constitute less than 1 percent of his annual giving, though the Erik Wemple Blog would need to see his tax returns to confirm such a figure.

Conflict-of-interest matters are an obsession of this blog, which views the mixing of money and favors between TV personalities and special interests as one of contemporary journalism's most toxic pollutants. The problem with Stephanopoulos's $50,000 donation to the Clinton Foundation is that it gives him a stake — even if it's a small one — in the operations and success of the charity. Like any donor, Stephanopoulos wants his money put to good use and, all else being equal, wants the foundation to prosper as it invests his money in good works.

Good journalism simply cannot tolerate such a stake. Stephanopoulos already has a history with the Clintons, having served as Bill's senior adviser for policy and strategy. Those ties already had media critics — many of them conservatives — wary of just how objective he could be in covering a Clinton-colored political landscape. Now he has confirmed their wariness, in perhaps the dumbest move by a major media figure in some time.

Does Stephanopoulos have the bona fides at this point to cover the Clintons? Nah.

ABC News, however, isn't budging. In a brief chat this morning, the Erik Wemple Blog quizzed ABC News spokeswoman Heather Riley on whether the network sees an ongoing conflict of interest. "We stand behind him," responded Riley. Can he objectively cover Hillary Clinton? "We stand behind him," responded Riley. We posed some other question, and Riley responded again, "We stand behind him."

The disclosures shed new light on a tough interview that Stephanopoulos conducted recently with Peter Schweizer, the author of "Clinton Cash," a much-discussed book that pokes at the overlapping worlds of the Clinton Foundation and Hillary Clinton's purview as secretary of state from 2009 to 2013. Stephanopoulos grilled the guy, "How does your reporting show that Hillary Clinton may be unfit for the presidency?" he asked, in kicking off the session. Over nearly eight minutes, Stephanopoulos kept the heat on, citing "no evidence at all" that Hillary Clinton was involved in a key decision discussed in the Schweizer book and pursuing the author over whether he'd briefed any Democrats about his book, as he did for Republicans.

"As you know, the Democrats have said this is an indication of your partisan interest. They say you used to work for President Bush as a speechwriter, you're funded by the Koch Brothers. How do you respond to that?" asked Stephanopoulos — all the while sitting on his own interest in the Clinton Foundation. Riley indicated that a note will be added to the interview online to disclose the anchor's contributions.

Perhaps Stephanopoulos's best defense would be to mention that the Clinton Foundation has developed some bipartisan muscles. Christopher Ruddy, the former Clinton antagonist and boss of conservative media outlet Newsmax, is a Clinton Foundation donor and fan. Bill Clinton welcomed New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie for a 2013 chat at a Clinton Global Initiative (CGI) meeting in Chicago. Republican presidential candidate Mitt Romney addressed CGI in 2012. But Stephanopoulos isn't mounting this defense, so we won't either.

George Stephanopoulos Interviewed Bill Clinton About CGI In 2013 // Buzzfeed News // Katherine Miller - May 14, 2015

George Stephanopoulos donated to the Clinton Foundation in 2013 — and he interviewed President Bill Clinton about the foundation's biggest project, the Clinton Global Initiative.

On Thursday, after questions from the Washington Free Beacon about public documents listing Stephanopoulos as a donor to the foundation, Stephanopoulos apologized for not disclosing the $50,000 in donations in a statement to Politico.

"I made charitable donations to the Foundation in support of the work they're doing on global AIDS prevention and deforestation, causes I care about deeply," he said in the statement. "I thought that my contributions were a matter of public record. However, in hindsight, I should have taken the extra step of personally disclosing my donations to my employer and to the viewers on air during the recent news stories about the Foundation. I apologize."

Stephanopoulos recently interviewed author Peter Schweizer about his book, Clinton Cash, which investigates the activities of the foundation.

In September of 2013, the This Week anchor sat down with Clinton for an interview that encompassed several topics, but included a three-minute segment about CGI.

"In the meantime, (Hillary Clinton) has joined the Clinton Foundation," Stephanopoulos says in the introduction to that segment. "[And] of course, at the Clinton Global Initiative, which brings philanthropists and CEOs together with nonprofits to make concrete commitments aimed at some of the world's toughest problems. Almost 10 years in, they have leveraged billions of dollars in assistance to more than 180 countries and we have talked to President Clinton about that, too."

The positive interview about the foundation is largely Clinton talking with few questions.

Stephanopoulos asks Clinton about the percentage of entities that make commitments that follow through ("Oh, it's quite good," Clinton says. "We get detailed progress reports now on 60% of the commitments.") and asks Clinton to talk about a large-scale project for women entrepreneurs ("Is that the project you're most excited about?").

A request for comment to ABC News about whether Stephanopoulos had donated to the foundation before or after the interview was not immediately returned.

George Stephanopoulos' 2016 Role Suddenly Less Certain Amid Criticism Over Clinton Foundation Donations / / Huffington Post // Michael Calderone and Sam Stein - May 14, 2015

UPDATE: Stephanopoulos told Politico that he will not moderate ABC News' Republican debate in New Hampshire. "I think I've shown that I can moderate debates fairly," he told Politico. "That said, I know there have been questions made about moderating debates this year. I want to be sure I don't deprive moderators or viewers of a good debate."

NEW YORK -- ABC News chief anchor George Stephanopoulos' status as a journalistic gatekeeper in the 2016 elections took a hit Thursday after it was revealed that he gave $50,000 in donations to the Clinton Foundation.

The donations, which were sitting in plain view on the Clinton Foundation website, had gone unnoticed until the conservative Washington Free Beacon began asking questions Wednesday night. ABC News confirmed the donations to Politico Thursday morning.

Stephanopoulos' ties to the Clintons aren't exactly state secrets. He served as a top aide to former President Bill Clinton during Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign and his first term in the White House. But Stephanopoulos carefully crafted a post-White House career as an objective newsman, joining ABC News in 1997 as a political analyst and rising to the top of the industry. He currently co-hosts “Good Morning America” and is the host of the Sunday public affairs show "This Week." Up until Thursday, he was the network’s most likely choice to moderate presidential primary debates.

The donations now complicate Stephanopoulos' 2016 role, re-surfacing Republicans' concerns that his pro-Clinton bias was latent rather than expunged. For the campaigns and the Republican National Committee, which already threatened to boycott networks that aired documentaries about Hillary Clinton, it seems likely to prompt further complaints about mainstream media's coverage of the 2016 Republican primary.

Kentucky Senator and Republican 2016 candidate Rand Paul told The New York Times shortly after the news broke that Stephanopoulos shouldn't moderate 2016 debates.

“It’s impossible to divorce yourself from that, even if you try,” Paul told The Times. “I just think it’s really, really hard because he’s been there, so close to them, that there would be a conflict of interest if he tried to be a moderator of any sort."

In a statement to The Huffington Post, Paul campaign spokesman Sergio Gor said the candidate has "raised a red flag" in the past over Stephanopoulos' role at ABC News and his moderating network-sponsored presidential debates. Indeed, Paul suggested in 2013 that Stephanopoulos "colluded" with Democrats when moderating a Republican debate the previous year; the ABC anchor dismissed the charge.

"We have always believed that Stephanopoulos has a clear conflict of interest when it comes to objective reporting," Gor said. "He would be wise to recuse himself from political coverage with Hillary Clinton in the race."

Conn Carroll, communications director for Senator Mike Lee (R-Utah), tweeted that he's not letting his boss go on ABC "unless Stephanopoulos recuses himself from all 2016 coverage."

"I was surprised he was in the mix even prior to this," said one Republican operative affiliated with a 2016 presidential campaign, who was not authorized to speak publicly. "It is just tough. He works for the Clintons. I’m not challenging his integrity. But there is a CYA [Cover Your Ass] element to it. Why would you put him in the debate setting?"

In a statement, Stephanopoulos defended the donations, saying his intention was to support the foundation’s work in global AIDS prevention and deforestation.

“I thought that my contributions were a matter of public record,” Stephanopoulos said, referring to their appearance on the foundation’s website. “However, in hindsight, I should have taken the extra step of personally disclosing my donations to my employer and to the viewers on air during the recent news stories about the Foundation. I apologize.”

The biggest hit Stephanopoulos could suffer may stem from his failure to reveal his own donations when interviewing conservative author Peter Schweizer last month. In the interview about Schweizer's controversial book, which claimed conflicts of interest stemming from foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation, Hillary Clinton’s tenure as Secretary of State and Bill Clinton’s lucrative paid speaking engagements, Stephanopoulos challenged Schweizer’s assertions, telling the author that ABC News “found no proof” Clinton gave preferential treatment to foundation donors while leading the State Department.

Conservative sites like NewsBusters and Breitbart News criticized the anchor’s handling of the interview. The latter, which argued that Stephanopoulos should have disclosed that he used to work for Bill Clinton, called him a “former Clinton aide” in its headline.

Jonathan Adler, writing two days later on The Washington Post's “Volokh Conspiracy" blog, took Stephanopoulos to task for his work history, arguing that Stephanopoulos should have disclosed his former employer when questioning Schweizer about the author's former employers and their impact on the reliability of Schweizer's reporting.

The disclosures Thursday now turn the spotlight on ABC News, which has watched from the sidelines for months as rival NBC News faced a barrage of negative stories resulting from the exaggerations of suspended anchor Brian Williams and the resulting network shake-up. So far, ABC News is backing up its star anchor and signaled in a statement that there will be no punitive action coming.

"As George has said, he made charitable donations to the Foundation to support a cause he cares about deeply and believed his contributions were a matter of public record," a network spokeswoman said. "He should have taken the extra step to notify us and our viewers during the recent news reports about the Foundation. He’s admitted to an honest mistake and apologized for that omission. We stand behind him."

Stephanopoulos did not respond to a request for comment and a spokeswoman did not make him available for an interview.

Outside the Clinton orbit, Democrats adopted a wait-and-see approach, content to let the episode play out without rendering judgement on Stephanopoulos' ability to moderate a debate. An aide to former Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley (D), who is considered a likely challenger to Hillary Clinton in the Democratic primary, declined to comment on the matter but said they weren't complaining, either.

Stephanopoulos has traversed these criticisms before, though not quite at this level of scrutiny. His role in the 2012 Republican presidential primary debates was criticized by conservative commentators who accused him of leaning on "gotcha" questions, like one about birth control. Conservative radio host Hugh Hewitt, who will be asking questions during CNN’s first Republican debate this fall, recently told HuffPost he won’t bring up contraceptives -- a reference to Stephanopoulos' infamous question.

During an episode of Fox News' "The Five" in late March, host Eric Bolling asked Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) if he thought it was "fair" for Stephanopoulos to moderate a debate "given his time with the Clintons as a spokesperson."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I personally don't have a problem with George Stephanopoulos," Rubio replied. "I dealt with him in his past, he's always been professional but I'm well aware of his history in the past."

Two weeks later, Rubio announced his candidacy for president. The first interview he gave was to Stephanopoulos.

Hillary Clinton's Campaign Manager Interned for George Stephanopoulos // Free Beacon // Brent Scher - May 14, 2015

George Stephanopoulos thanked Hillary Clinton's campaign manager Robby Mook in the acknowledgement section of his 1999 tell-all memoir All Too Human.

Stephanopoulos' book, described as "a new-generation political memoir" of a man "who got his hands on the levers of awesome power at an early age," was written after he left the Clinton administration and returned to his alma mater Columbia to be a visiting professor.

Mook was an undergrad student at Columbia during Stephanopoulos' brief tenure and was already politically active. He was a member of the College Democrats and was active in Democratic politics in his home state of Vermont.

Mook was also part of the team of interns who worked under Stephanopolous' research assistant at Columbia, responsible for "reviewing thousands of pages of public records and making sure I got my facts straight," wrote Stephanopolous.

Here is the excerpt from All Too Human where Mook is thanked:

Mook was part of Clinton's failed 2008 campaign, running multiple state campaigns. He would later run the successful Virginia gubernatorial campaign for Clinton's 2008 campaign chairman Terry McAuliffe.

The Washington Free Beacon discovered that Stephanopolous had donated thousands to the Clinton Foundation and failed to disclose that fact during ABC News' coverage of controversy surrounding the foundation.

Questions have been raised as to whether Stephanopolous' ties to the Clintons make him unable to impartially report on the 2016 election.

Stephanopoulos has since apologized for his failure to disclose the donations. He has also said that making the donations was a mistake and that he will not be moderating ABC's Republican debate.

Top members of the Clinton campaign hosted Stephanopoulos and other members of the media for an off-the-record dinner in New York City just days before the campaign was formally launched.

The Clinton campaign did not return a request for comment on Mook's relationship with Stephanopoulos.

Trump gave at least $100K to Clinton Foundation // The Hill // Mark Hensch - May 14, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New York real estate mogul Donald Trump and his daughter Ivanka have donated a combined total of at least $105,000 to the Clinton Foundation, records show.

“Donald J. Trump” is listed on the foundation’s website as giving between $100,000 and $250,000 to the charitable organization.

“Ivanka Trump,” meanwhile, is listed as a donor who gifted between $5,001 and $10,000 to the nonprofit.

“This list is comprised of those who made contributions or grants to advance the work of any part of the Clinton Foundation, including the Clinton Global Initiative, and indicates cumulative lifetime giving through 2014,” the website said.

The website does not specify when the Trumps donated, nor the exact amount of their contributions.

Donald Trump, a possible 2016 GOP presidential candidate, has repeatedly criticized Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton for her lack of transparency concerning the foundation.

“If this was a Republican sitting right there, this would absolutely be considered illegal,” Trump said last month of the foundation’s activities on Fox News’s “Fox and Friends.”

“This is about jail time; this isn’t about the voters,” he added.

The foundation’s records received new scrutiny on Thursday after ABC News anchor George Stephanopoulos admitted he had donated a total of $50,000 to the foundation as of 2014.

Stephanopoulos, an ex-political adviser for former President Bill Clinton, gave $25,000 in 2013 and then again the following year.

“I thought my contributions were a matter of public record,” said Stephanopoulos, who had not previously revealed his donations.

“However, in hindsight, I should have taken the extra step of personally disclosing my donations to my employer and to the viewers on air during the recent news stories about the Foundation,” he added.

Several Republicans on Thursday urged ABC to bench Stephanopoulos for its 2016 campaign coverage due to the conflict of interest.

“It’s impossible to divorce yourself from that, even if you try,” Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), a 2016 GOP contender, told The New York Times. “I just think it’s really, really hard because he’s been there, so close to them, that there would be a conflict of interest if he tried to be a moderator of any sort."

Author Peter Schweizer sparked interest in the Clinton Foundation’s finances with his new book Clinton Cash earlier this month.

It alleges that then-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton used her political power to grant favors to foreign donors who contributed to the foundation in return.

The Clinton family has denied any illicit activity involving the charitable organization bearing their name.

Progressives' looming challenge: Bill de Blasio, Elizabeth Warren, inequality, and a stunning blind spot // Salon // Joan Walsh - May 14, 2015

New York Mayor Bill de Blasio took his progressive agenda road show to Washington Tuesday, where he was trailed by local and national reporters in the fever grip of a narrative: How can de Blasio be a leader on national issues when the problems of his city aren't solved? What about the people hit on the head with hammers in Union Square while the mayor was gallivanting about on Tuesday? What about the carriage horses?

These were real questions put to de Blasio after a rather surreal event in which progressive leaders endorsed an agenda to tackle income inequality in early-May 90-degree heat, without any shade, just outside the Capitol. You could see all the promise and all the contradictions of the progressive movement in the sun-baked tableau. An actual story was on display, even as reporters chased non-issues and their cherished narrative. Debate buzzed around the overheated podium as dozens of Democratic Congress members, labor leaders and civil rights activists declared their support for the 13-point "Progressive Agenda to Combat Income Inequality" emblazoned on a poster beside them.

De Blasio was flanked by big placards supporting debt-free college and expanding Social Security, two demands that have rocketed to the top of the progressive agenda thanks to strong movements behind them. But those issues haven't yet officially made the 13-point list. A bigger omission was any mention of criminal justice reform. Organizer Van Jones amiably grumbled about the lack of an official agenda item as he caucused with concerned friends, who seemed bewildered by the omission, though Jones wholeheartedly endorsed the agenda when it was his turn to speak.

"We are going to go back to the coalition literally starting tomorrow and add a couple of the pieces, obviously with the agreement of coalition members, that people have said they thought would be very important," de Blasio promised the crowd. He's going to have to.

Meanwhile, as the event got underway, Senate Democrats were thwarting President Obama's attempt to fast-track deliberation on the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade accord, an issue that's both energizing and dividing the left, including the coalition behind de Blasio's agenda. Labor leaders railed against TPP from the podium; Rev. Al Sharpton, who supports the pact, preached "unity, not unanimity," and reminded the crowd that left-wing infighting in 1968, the year Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. was assassinated, and a teenage Sharpton joined the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, elected Richard Nixon.

The long day ended with a devastating Amtrak derailment outside Philadelphia, killing at least seven people on a train that I was almost aboard. (I caught the last train to New York.) I suppose that concentrated my mind on this allegedly progressive moment.

The crisis couldn't be more clear: Infrastructure used to be an easy, bipartisan issue. Now, as a nation, we've gone from debating high speed rail, to cutting funding for low-speed rail, to tolerating no-speed rail this week along the Northeast Corridor, where de Blasio's New York will lose $100 million every day train travel is halted. News that the engineer was going 100 miles an hour, way over the advised speed for that stretch of track, doesn't change the fact that too many antiquated stretches of track require much less speed than is customary for train travel around the world. Or that "positive train control" technology, which should have already been installed, hadn't been there. The tragedy ought to muzzle reporters who robotically ask why New York's mayor traveled to Washington, not only to lobby for federal action but to rally a new political coalition that can fix our broken politics. But it probably won't.

Progressives have a moment, all right, but are they up to it? My day with de Blasio provided some answers, not all of them encouraging. The New York mayor's effort is widely perceived as an attempt to pull Hillary Clinton to the left, in the absence of a strong primary challenger. (It got underway before Sen. Bernie Sanders announced his candidacy, but Sanders, alone, probably isn't much threat to the front-runner.) The debate over its agenda shows that progressives care, passionately, about the 2016 election, and beyond. They believe they can drive the debate.

But first, they might have to get out of their own way. As the Obama era comes to a close, they are still grappling with the issues of race, and not always well. There are lessons here for Hillary Clinton, though maybe not the ones de Blasio and allies intended.

My big day of progressive politicking began with a National Press Club event to release a new report by the lefty-wonky Roosevelt Institute, "Rewriting the Rules of the American Economy: An Agenda for Growth and Shared Prosperity." Roosevelt economist and Nobel Laureate Joseph Stiglitz called it "a big think," and he's right. The event was keynoted by Sen. Elizabeth Warren and de Blasio. You could see many of the assets of 2015 progressive organizing on display.

For one thing, there's rare bipartisan agreement that income inequality is growing, and that it's a problem, although Republicans continue to advance only warmed-over Reaganism as a solution. There's also growing recognition among liberals that their efforts must go beyond tinkering at the margins of the economy while venerating the allegedly "free" market. Markets aren't magic; they're created by socially constructed rules. "Rewriting the Rules" meticulously shows how the economic "rules" laid down by government in the years after World War II deliberately spread prosperity. Then, starting in the late '70s, our rules began to concentrate it.

"If someone said in the 1980s, 'we're going to change the rules, and all the income gains will go to the top," nobody would have supported that, Stiglitz told me after the event. That's why there's an opening now to "rewrite the rules," in the Roosevelt Institute's phrasing. "It wasn't an act of God," de Blasio told the crowd. American political leaders made political decisions to intensify income inequality; they can make different ones.

A third boon to progressive politics is the fact that there's an agenda widely supported by liberals (and according to polls, by the general public too). It involves efforts to shore up families with paid family leave and early childhood programs; boosting pay by hiking the minimum wage and strengthening labor rights, particularly the right to organize; and a range of progressive taxation ideas, including eliminating lower rates for wealth than work. Roosevelt's agenda got a little bit into the weeds, but by necessity; de Blasio's stayed focused on broader demands.

Finally: these demands are bolstered by rising grass-roots movements. There's more on-the-ground activism — around fast-food workers' wages, the "Fight for $15" campaign, Wal-Mart workers' rights — than I've seen on the left in a long while. In their remarks at the Roosevelt event, both de Blasio and Warren referenced the grass-roots energy as a resource progressives must harness.

Yet I was surprised that neither referred to what might be the most vibrant and important movement of all: the organizing around "Black Lives Matter" and the effort to end the era of mass incarceration. De Blasio's Progressive Agenda didn't mention criminal justice reform or anything related to it; the Roosevelt Institute report, laudably, does include a bullet point recommending "Reform the criminal justice system to reduce incarceration rates," but it's one of 37 recommendations and easily missed (mea culpa; in an earlier version of this post, I missed it). I've worked on these issues my entire career, and I've got to say: Sometimes I'm amazed at the white left's blurry vision when it comes to race.

I asked de Blasio about that omission when we met briefly on Tuesday afternoon.

“I think this agenda, and this coalition, is going to grow,” he told me. “We have to connect the fact that income inequality is deeply connected to mass incarceration, that racism underlies the lack of opportunity for men of color. I think those two issues go naturally together and I’m going to be putting a lot of time into them.”

But there was a lot of discontent with the omission from the 13-point agenda when we got to the official event, which almost fell apart over the controversy. Van Jones, rather admirably, fell on his sword when I asked him about it by phone the next day. Like a lot of black progressives, he’s been focused on the situation in Baltimore, in the wake of Freddie Gray’s killing by police, and wasn’t entirely on top of the drafting of the agenda.

“I was one of the people who was at the initial Gracie Mansion event,” he told me, carefully, on Wednesday afternoon. “In the drafting of the agenda, I was not as attentive or involved as earlier, because of Baltimore. I didn’t do my due diligence on the back end. I appreciate that the mayor made a commitment to go back to all the parties on a ‘schools not jobs’ plank.” But I found myself wondering why the issue required a push from Jones, anyway, given its centrality to the opportunity crisis in America.

Meanwhile, just yards away from the de Blasio convening, Obama lost a round on the TPP. New York’s mayor stood squarely with the Massachusetts senator on the issue. “The bottom line on trade is I couldn’t agree more with Elizabeth Warren,” he told the crowd.

But there was an ugly parallel dust-up. Sen. Sherrod Brown – who’d attended the inaugural meeting of de Blasio’s effort at New York’s Gracie Mansion in early April, but wasn’t at the Capitol event – lamented the president’s very personal attacks on Sen. Warren, suggesting they might even be a little bit sexist. The president, Brown noted, has attacked Warren by her first name, “when he might not have done that for a male senator, perhaps?”

I didn’t read Obama’s Warren comments as sexist – he regularly refers to Vice President Biden as “Joe” — although I thought they were weirdly personal and politically counter-productive. But I also didn’t read Brown’s criticism of Obama as reflecting racial animus – but Obama die-hards online did, with one perhaps parody Twitter account claiming the president had been “Emmett Tilled” for allegedly mistreating a white woman.

It reminded me that the fault lines of the 2008 primary campaign still exist, even as Democrats appear remarkably united, compared to the fractious 2016 GOP field, which is currently embroiled in a dead end debate about Iraq. (Poor Jeb.) And those fault lines weren’t closed, in any way, by the omission of criminal justice reform from the de Blasio agenda.

The stillness at the center of this storm is, oddly, Hillary Clinton. Many observers and even some participants see de Blasio’s project as an effort to pull her left. Now that she’s in the race, she’s arguably to the left of de Blasio’s agenda, given her recent policy statements calling for an end to mass incarceration, and promising to protect even more undocumented immigrants from deportation than are covered by Obama’s executive orders.

Pointing to the new divisions in the Democratic Party over trade, MSNBC’s Luke Russert asked de Blasio whether he thought Clinton had to stand with Warren on the TPP to win his group’s support. De Blasio ducked a direct answer, even as he declared his own support for Warren’s stand.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I asked de Blasio if he could see any scenario in which he didn't endorse Clinton. "I don't do hypotheticals," he told me. When I laughed at that, he added, "But I can say honestly, I'm optimistic…She gave the speech on immigration, which I thought was great, the speech on criminal justice reform I thought was great. I think we're seeing a lot. I still want to hear the core agenda for fighting income inequality, but this is a very promising start."

Part of me thinks the best thing de Blasio can do to advance "the core agenda for fighting income inequality" is to be a great mayor of New York. But I'm also sympathetic to both his genuine need to harness federal support, in order to be a great mayor, and also to harness the impressive populist energy that fueled his unlikely rise to Gracie Mansion.

Given the controversy roiling around him on Tuesday, de Blasio maintained an enviable equanimity. In the end I found myself thinking he has the temperament to play a role in harnessing the energy of the fractious left, because he smiled and nodded his way through Tuesday's event. He affably fielded dumb media questions in the 90-degree heat, while things were even hotter inside his own coalition, given the neglect of criminal justice reform on his agenda. Still, I can't help thinking: The man who won office at least partly because he's Dante's father shouldn't be struggling through an unforced error around an issue of race.

Dems: Hillary Clinton must campaign more // Politico // James Hohmann and Katie Glueck – May 14, 2015

Four in 10 Democratic insiders in the early states warn that Hillary Clinton is not spending enough time on the campaign trail, making her vulnerable to possible challenges from the left and dampening the enthusiasm of progressives who are already committed to her.

The POLITICO Caucus — our weekly bipartisan pulse-taking of the most important activists, operatives and elected officials in Iowa and New Hampshire — also finds Democrats almost evenly divided over whether Clinton needs to take a firmer position on the trade battle that's gripped Washington this week, but many approve of Bill Clinton's efforts to be a more silent partner in his wife's campaign.

Clinton will return to Iowa and New Hampshire next week, amidst an aggressive fundraising swing. Her campaign said Thursday that the events will again be small and relatively private.

But insiders are clamoring for the former secretary of state to do more events that allow more voters to see her in person. There's a pervasive belief that her campaign stops need to feel more authentic and open in order to fire up the base.

"She needs to step it up dramatically," said a pro-Clinton Iowa Democrat, who — like all 77 respondents — completed the questionnaire anonymously in order to speak candidly.

"We have this need to feel well-loved every four years," said an uncommitted New Hampshire Democrat. "If other candidates begin to make inroads, Clinton's absence will be noted."

Several Democrats said she should headline a rally or give a major speech soon. One key Democrat in Iowa, where she finished third in 2008, explained that "a big open-attendance event would go a long way because it would at least let people actually see her" in person.

To escape the media scrum, a New Hampshire Democrat suggested Clinton show up unannounced in the less populous North Country. "Drop in on breakfast at a couple local spots, and then let word trickle out," the uncommitted activist said. "She can spend a few hours doing very normal, hassle-free retail campaigning and then hold some kind of press avail later in the day."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On the other hand, a lot of Democrats joked that their friends will never be satisfied no matter how much time Hillary puts in on the ground. “There is more concern out there among Democrats than I would have thought,” said one in New Hampshire. “People feel freer to voice their concerns about the Big Crash that everyone thinks will happen to her campaign.”

Some establishment Democrats think there’s little upside to mixing it up at this stage, and they believe that the press is obsessed only with asking gotcha questions. “The less time she can spend on the campaign trail, the better,” said an uncommitted New Hampshire Democrat. “Events bring a lot of unwelcome attacks,” said another. “She’s on the money trail now,” said a pro-Clinton Democrat in Iowa. “There is time in the fall to wear out her shoes.”

Even some who want her on the trail more note a massive influx of field staff over the past month. “In Des Moines, I always see three or four of them meeting for coffee at the Smokey Row coffee house,” said a Democrat, referring to local hangout. “As a matter of fact, the O’Malley guy hangs out there too!”

Seven in 10 Republicans said Clinton spends too little time campaigning. “But when she does, she is so horrible, dull, scripted and phony that the Hillary juggernaut should create plans to build a soundproof Rose Garden in Brooklyn,” said a Granite Stater.

“Just about every other day I run into a Democrat who says, ‘Jeez, your side is having all the fun,’” said an Iowan.

One-third of GOP insiders said she’s smart to limit her appearances.

“She has no credible opponents,” said a New Hampshire Republican. “She could hibernate for the next 10 months and be totally absent from the campaign trail. And still be fine.”

Here are eight other takeaways from this 14th edition of The POLITICO Caucus:

Jeb’s fumbling of questions about Iraq reminds insiders of Bush-name baggage.

It took until Thursday for Bush to clarify that, knowing now about intelligence failures in the lead-up to the invasion of Iraq, authorized by his brother, he would not have gone to war there. Earlier this week, he dismissed that question as a “hypothetical” — a position that three-quarters of Republican insiders called problematic.

Several insiders think the kerfuffle will make it harder for Bush to distance himself from his brother, former President George W. Bush.

“Pretty bad given that he’s already battling the Bush fatigue and dynasty issue,” said one New Hampshire Republican.

An uncommitted Iowa Republican added, “This would not be a big deal if he had a different last name. But since his name is Bush, it’s another log on the ‘Bush Fatigue’ fire.”

And a New Hampshire Republican aligned with a rival camp piled on: “It reminds everyone that he has been, is,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

and will be in his brother's shadow, which not only raises policy concerns but also the specter of dynasty."

The Iraq episode also raises questions about whether Jeb's ready for primetime.

Many insiders from both parties expressed disbelief that Bush wasn't better-prepared to answer questions about the war in Iraq.

"Take away whether you agree or disagree with his answer, hypothetical or not, the fact that he is so incredibly unprepared for the spotlight is very alarming," said one Iowa Republican who supports another candidate. "As I answer this survey, he has changed his position for a third time. Hello!?"

An unaffiliated Granite State Republican noted that New Hampshire is not a particularly hawkish state, and that the unpopularity of the war in Iraq cost Republicans a lot of New Hampshire seats, in Congress and the statehouse, back in 2006 and 2008.

"If there was one topic Jeb Bush needed to have a good answer on during this campaign, this was it," the insider said. "More than anything, these answers from Jeb this week were a reminder for Republicans about what they disliked most about his brother."

On the other side of the aisle, a New Hampshire Democrat aligned with Clinton sniped, "He has handled talking about Iraq about as well as his brother handled the actual war. Jeb Bush is the obvious frontrunner, and he is stumbling out of the gate."

Use W. only in doses, and generally with donors.

Most Republican insiders didn't think Bush did himself any harm when he recently called his brother his top adviser on U.S.-Israel policy (though Democrats overwhelmingly did). But he should keep the references to his brother to a minimum, they said, and the overwhelming answer to how the former president could be helpful was through fundraising, preferably behind closed doors.

"He's a fool to use W for anything other than shaking money out of people," said one Iowa Republican aligned with another candidate.

A New Hampshire Democrat noted gleefully, "Is this even a question on the Republican side? As a Democrat, I heartily endorse the idea of George W. Bush coming to … campaign frequently for Jeb!"

But several respondents did note that the former president could be a helpful voice, in private, as his brother seeks to court pro-Israel and evangelical voters.

"Those voters who support Israel know that President Bush was a staunch, unequivocating ally of the nation," said one unaligned New Hampshire Republican. "That Gov. Bush is taking his cues from him is a welcome development especially since so many Jewish people believe that President Obama is capitulating to anti-Israeli interests. For example, dispatching him to smooth things over with Sheldon Adelson was a smart move."

As for Bill, many Democrats also want him to keep a low profile.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Most insiders see Bill Clinton as an excellent speaker who can rally the base and energize crowds. But for now, he should avoid overshadowing the actual candidate by sticking largely to fundraisers and lower-key events, they say.

"He needs to let Hillary get out more first and set the tone of her campaign, talk about her messages and connect with voters," said a New Hampshire Democrat. "Once she establishes her campaign more widely, he should sweep in on the latter half and campaign for her. He is an asset — for sure — but people also want to hear about her and her ideas."

Republicans, and some Democrats, noted that Bill Clinton has caused some problems for the Clinton campaign in the way he's handled questions about donations to their family foundation. Staying out of the limelight for now, some said, would help.

"He needs to be supportive and in the background," an Iowa Democrat said. "So far his comments have not helped, especially when questioned about the Clinton Foundation."

Several noted his ability, for better and worse, to go off-script.

"He is a huge asset to Secretary Clinton. But at the same time, his likeability comes from his brilliance and ability to speak provocatively and not without a little thrilling unpredictability," said one New Hampshire Democrat. "How do you solve a problem like Bill Clinton? He must be putting quite few gray hairs on Robby Mook's little head," the insider continued, referring to Clinton's 35-year-old campaign manager.

Another New Hampshire Democrat called for fewer speeches and more retail: "Put a loose leash on the Big Dog, but someone definitely needs to be holding the leash."

Democrats are divided over whether Hillary needs to take a firmer position on trade.

About half of Democrats think Clinton must say outright whether she supports the 12-nation Pacific trade deal and giving President Barack Obama fast-track authority. She's given nuanced answers that nod to both sides; the White House has insisted that Clinton is on their side, and some opponents of the deal have said that her silence shows she's with them.

As the issue blew up on Capitol Hill this week, there's increasing pressure from both sides for Clinton to give a yes-or-no answer.

"Just days ago I would have said that most voters, even most base voters, didn't have [this] on their radar at all," said a New Hampshire Democrat. "Between media coverage, candidates scrambling to stake out policy positions, and even the President sending desperate-sounding emails to try to muster grassroots support, this issue is now on the front burner."

"Democrats haven't forgotten that her husband, who has been referred to as 'Outsourcer-in-Chief,' is held largely responsible for NAFTA and the negative impacts of those trade agreements," the Democrat added. "That puts Hillary in a difficult place."

Clinton allies argue that it's unfair to say she hasn't taken a position; it's just that she's very carefully threaded the needle. Asked about the Trans-Pacific Partnership recently in New Hampshire, for example, she said: "Well, any trade deal has to produce jobs, and raise wages, and increase prosperity and protect our security. And we have to do our part in making sure we have the capabilities and the skills to be competitive."

"Nothing wrong with Hillary not cutting POTUS off at knees, while expressing deep reservations," said a New Hampshire Democrat.

"In Iowa, her base is probably divided on the issue," added an Iowa Democrat. "Rural communities tend to support trade deals, while organized labor tends to oppose them."

Seven in 10 Republicans said she cannot get away with not giving a more definitive answer.

Backing up Obama on trade would hurt Hillary; the question is how badly.

There's a sense among several leading Democratic activists in the early states that Clinton standing with Obama might encourage Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) to reconsider running.

"Base voters would not want her to align herself with Obama on such a conservative issue," said an Iowa Democrat. "All trade bills have played into the hands of conservatives in the past, and this one won't be any different."

"She would lose a lot of support among the base," said another Iowa Democrat who backs her. "This would become a litmus test for many Democratic activists, particularly organized labor. She needs to oppose it."

"It would move a non-trivial amount of support to Bernie Sanders," said a New Hampshire Democrat.

Clinton boosters argue that the damage would be limited because these are people who wouldn't back her anyway.

"Progressives in Iowa that have already been reluctant to support her would use this as a rallying cry," said an Iowa Democrat who backs her. "I think it wouldn't lose her support but would make the opposition louder."

"Anyone who would be pressing Hillary on this is likely already in the Sanders/O'Malley/anti-Hillary faction, and they feel very awkward because they were all primary supporters of President Obama over Hillary in 2008," added a New Hampshire Democrat.

Others pointed out that the last three Democratic governors of New Hampshire were pretty openly pro-free trade. "Labor doesn't have a big footprint here, and the people who are ardently opposed to the president's trade agenda are unlikely to be big Clinton supporters to begin with," said a New Hampshire Democrat.

Despite the events of this week, the Republican base does not really care about the trade fight.

This is the first huge, public intra-party fight in a while for Democrats, but most Republican insiders said their base is not paying attention in the early states.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“C’mon, there isn’t one voter in 100 who knows enough about these trade deals to explain them to someone else,” said one in New Hampshire.

“It still feels like a D.C./Beltway/K Street issue,” said another.

“The isolationist, [Pat] Buchanan wing of the party is fervently dead-set against it, but they are far outnumbered by those who favor it or don’t care,” added an Iowa Republican.

Agricultural interests are big proponents of the measure, and Iowa exports over $15 billion a year. But an Iowa Republican noted that fights over trade seem abstract for many voters. “Maslow’s hierarchy of needs is on the low end with so many security-based concerns,” he said. “Trade is more self-actualization to voters.”

Paul should seize the spotlight in the Patriot Act brawl.

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) has pledged to filibuster the reauthorization of the Patriot Act as the Senate takes up the matter again — a good move for him, at least in the more libertarian Granite State, insiders say. Nearly three-quarters of both New Hampshire Republicans and Democrats say Paul’s plan would help in their state.

“This is New Hampshire. Live Free or Die! Don’t tread on me, and leave my phone records alone,” said one Granite State Democrat who said the filibuster would be an asset.

Added an unaligned New Hampshire Republican: “It enhances his standing with a vocal minority in a field with 19 candidates. To win New Hampshire you only have to be able to count to 25 percent.”

Respondents from Iowa were more divided about whether the move would be useful: nearly as many Iowa Republicans said it would help as said a filibuster would hurt (less than one in 10 New Hampshire Republicans said the same). On the other side of the aisle, nearly half of Iowa Democrats said it would help; roughly one-tenth said it would hurt.

“He is supposed to already have the libertarian vote share his father got,” said one Iowa Republican who aligns with another candidate. “He needs to moderate his views on this so he can attract voters who are more worried about national security.”

Bernie Sanders has picked a terrible argument against the TPP // Vox // Dylan Matthews - May 14, 2015

There are good reasons to oppose the Trans-Pacific Partnership, the big Asian trade deal the Obama administration is hoping to finalize soon. I lean against it, mostly because it could hurt poor countries left out of the pact (notably Bangladesh and Cambodia), and because I think trade liberalization should be happening globally through the WTO rather than in piecemeal regional agreements.

But it's hard to sympathize with the arguments Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-VT) put forward in his statement Tuesday, celebrating the Senate's rejection of a bill that'd enable final approval of the pact without congressional amendments:

A major reason for the decline of the American middle class and the increase in wealth and income inequality in the United State is our trade policies - NAFTA, CAFTA and Permanent Normal Trade Relations with China. This agreement would follow in the footsteps of those free trade agreements which have forced American workers to compete against desperate and low-wage workers around the world – including workers in Vietnam where the minimum wage is 56-cents an hour.

Sanders is suggesting that TPP would be bad because it would force US workers to compete with workers in Vietnam — implicitly, that it's bad because it expands economic opportunity for poor workers in Vietnam at the expense of significantly richer workers in the United States.

The factual basis for this claim is pretty dubious. Even economists who think trade has significantly hurt US manufacturing workers tend to think the damage is already done, and that future trade deals will involve sectors of the economy in which the US does more exporting than importing (namely, services and agriculture). Moreover, insofar as the deal would advantage imports, that would lower prices for US consumers, particularly poor and middle-class consumers for whom spending on manufactured goods and clothes eats up a bigger share of income. And how much it expands opportunity in Vietnam depends a lot on the specific "rules of origin" in the deal.

But even if the deal did, on net, hurt American workers, Sanders is implicitly arguing that it's worth impoverishing desperately poor people abroad so that far richer people in the United States can be slightly better off. I don't think Sanders bears any ill will toward developing-world workers; he's consistently supported raising labor standards abroad, and during the debate over CAFTA he explicitly stated that he thought the deal would be a "disaster for the people of Central America," as well as for the US.

But he's simply mistaken about what's best for the developing world. "Forc[ing] American workers to compete against desperate and low-wage workers around the world" is not just good for those "desperate and low-wage workers"; it's actually a demand placed on developed countries by the UN Millennium Development Goals, which call for "tariff- and quota-free access for Least Developed Countries' exports." No members of the official least developed countries list are actually part of TPP — they're even poorer, and thus, on Sanders's logic, more dangerous as trading competition to the US.

When you talk to development experts who focus on trade, like the Center for Global Development's Kimberly Ann Elliott, the one point they press on again and again is the need for DFQF — duty-free, quota-free — access to rich countries' markets for exporters in least developed countries. There's been progress on this front. Through the Everything but Arms program, the European Union provides DFQF access to non-arms imports from least developed countries. In 2005, rich countries in the WTO committed to providing DFQF access to at least 97 percent of products. Through the African Growth and Opportunity Act, the US provides duty-free (but not quota-free) access to the US market for many sub-Saharan African nations. But the goal of completely free exports from all least-developed countries to all rich countries is still not reached, both because certain sensitive products (particularly in agriculture) are exempted from its benefits and because, in the US's case, many poor countries are left out of the deal.

A true anti-poverty trade agenda would be the exact opposite of what Sanders wants. It would directly put US workers in competition with more — and poorer — workers abroad. The effects on US workers would likely be small, but even if they weren't, that trade is worth making. Fighting desperate poverty in the developing world is more important than marginally boosting the US middle class. And there are many, many ways to help the American middle class that don't involve keeping the world's poorest people in a state of total immiseration.

Is Bernie Sanders the Best Candidate on Climate Change? // Mother Jones // Ben Adler - May 14, 2015

The Democratic presidential primary race got its second major candidate recently, and its first true climate hawk: Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, self-described democratic socialist. Sanders has one of the strongest climate change records in the Senate. In fact, according to rankings released by Climate Hawks Vote, a new super PAC, Sanders was the No. 1 climate leader in the Senate for the 113th Congress that ended in January.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Climate Hawks Vote measures leadership, not just voting records, tabulating actions like bills introduced, speeches given, and so forth. In the 112th Congress, Sanders ranked third behind Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.) and Jeff Merkley (D-Ore.). In the last Congress, he edged out Whitehouse by one point.

"Sanders is very much among the top leaders," says R.L. Miller, founder of Climate Hawks Vote. "He has a record of really strong advocacy for solar in particular." Miller notes that distributed solar, which enables everyone with a solar panel to create their own energy instead of relying on a monopolistic utility company, fits especially well with Sanders' democratic socialist philosophy. It's bad for corporations and good for regular folks who get to own the means of production.

Here are some of the highlights from Sanders' climate and clean energy record:

In 2013, along with Sen. Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.), Sanders introduced the Climate Protection Act, a fee-and-dividend bill. It would tax carbon and methane emissions and rebate three-fifths of the revenue to citizens, then invest the remainder in energy efficiency, clean energy, and climate resiliency. The bill, of course, went nowhere (even if it had advanced in the Democratic-controlled Senate, it would have been DOA in the Republican-controlled House), but it shows that Sanders supports serious solutions and wants to keep the conversation going.

Also in 2013, Sanders introduced the Residential Energy Savings Act to fund financing programs that would help residents retrofit their homes for energy efficiency. This bill didn't become law either.

In 2012, Sanders introduced the End Polluter Welfare Act, to get rid of special tax deductions and credits for coal, oil, and gas producers. As he wrote in Grist at the time, "It is immoral that some in Congress advocate savage cuts in Medicare, Medicaid, and Social Security while those same people vote to preserve billions in tax breaks for ExxonMobil, the most profitable corporation in America." The bill didn't pass.

In 2010, Sanders authored a bill to spread distributed solar throughout the country, the very literally named "10 Million Solar Roofs & 10 Million Gallons of Solar Hot Water Act." As Grist's David Roberts explained, it would "provide rebates that cover up to half the cost of new systems, along the lines of incentive programs in California and New Jersey." The bill didn't pass.

In 2007, he cowrote with then-Sen. Hillary Clinton (D-N.Y.) the Green Jobs Act, which allocated funding for clean energy and energy efficiency research and job training. This did pass, as part of a big 2007 energy bill.

Also in 2007, with Sen. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.), he cosponsored the Energy Efficiency and Conservation Block Grant Program, to help states and local governments pay for efficiency and clean energy programs. It was also passed as part of the 2007 energy bill, and both the block grant program and the green jobs program got a funding infusion from the 2009 stimulus package.

So we know Sanders is dedicated to climate action and clean energy. Looking forward, though, it's unclear how Sanders will differentiate his climate and energy proposals from Clinton's. Clinton, like President Obama, firmly supports regulating carbon emissions domestically and getting strong international agreements to reduce emissions globally. While it is certainly true that Sanders has made more of an issue of his support for the same, it is not necessarily an issue on which Clinton needs to be pushed leftward. Many climate hawks love the fee-and-dividend approach that Sanders supports, but the truth is that no big climate-pricing bill will pass in the next few years, no matter who's president, because the Republicans will continue to control the House. And Clinton already supports the kind of strong executive action that Obama is taking to curb CO_2 emissions from power plants.

One way Sanders could set himself apart as the greenest candidate would be to propose clamping down on domestic fossil fuel extraction, especially on federal lands and waters—something a president could move on without congressional approval. Sanders has not spoken up about the extraction issue in general, but he could call for a moratorium on fossil fuel leasing offshore or on federal land. That would please climate activists, who are already expressing concern that Clinton isn't committed to keeping dirty fuel sources in the ground. "What we really need," says Miller, "is someone to advocate for closing down the Powder River Basin"—an area in Montana and Wyoming that's a huge source of coal mined from federal land—"but no one is really willing to come out and say that, so instead they come out for higher prices on coal leases. Sanders has not."

In an interview with the Washington Post's Greg Sargent, Sanders called for a progressive climate agenda that includes a carbon tax and investments in renewables, energy efficiency, and alternative transportation—but he made no mention of restricting fossil fuel development. Here is what he offered:

A tax on carbon; a massive investment in solar, wind, geothermal; it would be making sure that every home and building in this country is properly winterized; it would be putting substantial money into rail, both passenger and cargo, so we can move towards breaking our dependency on automobiles. And it would be leading other countries around the world.

Bill McKibben, who founded 350.org and has led the fight to stop the Keystone XL pipeline, says he is confident Sanders understands the need to keep fossil fuels in the ground. Sanders has opposed Keystone, while Clinton has avoided taking a position on it. "He's been the most consistent and proactive voice in the entire Keystone fight," writes McKibben in an email. "Everything that's been needed—from speeches on the floor to legislation to demands that the State Department change its absurd review process—he and his staff have done immediately and with a high degree of professionalism…On climate stuff he's been the most aggressive voice in the Senate, rivaled only by Sheldon Whitehouse. He understands it for the deep, simple problem it is: that we can't keep burning this stuff." (Full disclosure: McKibben is a member of Grist's board of directors.)

One area where Sanders indisputably differs from Clinton is trade. Clinton, like her husband and Obama, has been an ardent supporter of free trade agreements. Some environmentalists worry that these agreements—like NAFTA, CAFTA, and the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) that is currently under consideration—give polluting companies too much power to undermine environmental regulations in signatory nations. As secretary of state, Clinton supported the TPP, although as a candidate her campaign advisors say she hasn't made up her mind on it. Sanders is one of the most skeptical members of the Senate on trade agreements and he is currently helping to lead the charge against the TPP.

To describe Sanders' challenge against Clinton as uphill would be too generous. It's more like climbing Mt. Everest—without oxygen or a guide. But by bringing attention to some of these issues, he may raise awareness and draw Clinton out. Sanders' office declined to comment for this story, citing an overwhelming number of interview requests following announcement of his candidacy. That speaks to the megaphone a presidential campaign can grant a candidate, especially in a nearly empty field. Sanders is sure to use it for worthy causes. Will keeping fossil fuels in the ground be one of them?

Democrats 2016: Sanders Now Clinton’s Chief Rival // Center for Politics // Geoffrey Skelley - May 14th, 2015

“Inevitable.” That’s the word often used to describe Hillary Clinton and the 2016 Democratic nomination. Can anyone beat her? Anything’s possible, but the odds appear quite low. Still, her most threatening intraparty opposition could prove to be a man who isn’t even technically a Democrat (yet, anyway): independent Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, a self-identified “democratic socialist.” We see him as a potential thorn in Clinton’s side, and to reflect that, we are moving Sanders to the top of the non-Clinton tier in our presidential rankings for Democrats.

Some progressive activists are still hoping Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-MA) will get into the race. However, while she reportedly met with some members of the “Draft Warren” movement in late April, it still seems very unlikely that the Bay State senator will run. The idea of New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio (D) running, and doing so credibly, is even harder to fathom than a Warren candidacy: He’s only less than a year and a half into his first term, and already he is controversial and has just a 44% job approval rating (according to Tuesday's Quinnipiac survey).

Sanders is in a position to fill the void to Clinton's left, possibly attracting voters who are skeptical of Clinton because of her ties to Wall Street and her perceived hawkishness on foreign policy issues. Because of his issue positions and personality, Sanders could be an attractive candidate for liberals who want someone to press Clinton on topics like income inequality, free trade, and her Senate vote in favor of authorizing the Iraq War (although that vote is now more than a decade old).

On the issues, Sanders was the third-most liberal senator in the last Congress, behind only Warren and Sen. Tammy Baldwin (D-WI). His presidential announcement speech highlighted his goal of creating "an economy that works for all people rather than a small number of billionaires" and denounced the role of money in politics, particularly the post-Citizens United campaign finance system. While a member of the House in 2002, Sanders voted against the Iraq War and is a leading opponent of the Trans-Pacific Partnership agreement and other free trade deals. He has also favored nixing the Keystone XL Pipeline project, a matter about which Clinton has remained publicly undecided. These are all positions that will win him support among progressive and labor groups.

But along with his policy views, Sanders' personal characteristics may also make him a potent "protest" option for liberals in the Democratic primary. He is assertive and knows precisely what he believes in –and is unabashed in expressing himself. Moreover, Sanders is unlikely to have delusions of grandeur — he knows he isn't going to be the presidential nominee — so he has nothing to lose by pushing Clinton hard.

Looking back at past presidential campaigns, a point of comparison for Sanders is Eugene McCarthy, the Democratic Minnesota senator and three-time presidential candidate. McCarthy ran against President Lyndon Johnson in the 1968 New Hampshire primary and stunned everyone by nearly defeating the incumbent. The outcome spurred Sen. Robert F. Kennedy to announce his own candidacy and led to Johnson's stunning decision to not seek reelection. Like Sanders, McCarthy had an independent streak, and in fact McCarthy ran for the presidency in 1976 as an independent. Democrats are relieved that Sanders has personally pledged not to bolt like McCarthy and play a Ralph Nader-like role (a la 2000) in the 2016 general election campaign.

To some extent, Clinton may be okay with Sanders potentially becoming her most serious opponent. Clinton has long known that someone would emerge to make the Democratic primary battle at least a minimal contest for the media to cover. Additionally, plenty of party activists in the early states want some competition in the race. Why not have her main challenger be the very liberal Sanders, someone who will lack the resources and standing to truly threaten her? Clinton also knows that she will need the base to turn out heavily in November 2016, so she has already moved to the left on certain issues, most recently immigration. Whereas someone like ex-Gov. Martin O'Malley (D-MD) fits the profile of a more serious challenger to Clinton (or did at some point), Sanders is a senator from one of the smallest states, is unknown to most Americans, and cannot defeat Clinton, barring incredible unforeseen circumstances.

Speaking of O'Malley, his stock has tumbled in light of the recent events in Baltimore, where he served as mayor prior to becoming governor of Maryland. Criminal justice policies he implemented as mayor, such as zero-tolerance policing, have come under fire from critics who believe they contributed to the long-term problems undergirding the recent riots in Charm City. O'Malley has said he would announce in Baltimore "if" he runs for president, a very likely move at this point, but this location won't provide an ideal campaign backdrop. Although he has to own and defend his record as mayor and governor if he's to remain a credible candidate, Baltimore's unrest can and will be used against O'Malley. For the time being, he is positioned behind Sanders in our rankings.

While we have shifted our Democratic rankings this week, we also have one change on the Republican side of the ledger: Gov. Rick Snyder (R-MI) announced last week that he will not seek the 2016 GOP nomination for president, meaning that we can again remove him from the Crystal Ball list. We had actually taken Snyder out of our rankings weeks ago but brought him back in our last Republican updatebecause of numerous reports suggesting he would run. But now that he's explicitly said he won't, "one tough nerd" exits our rankings. That leaves a still-staggering 19 names on our Republican list.

O'Malley secured Baltimore headquarters for potential presidential bid // Baltimore Sun // Erin Cox - May 14, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former governor Martin O'Malley on Friday will sign a lease for 7,200 square feet of office space across the street from Baltimore's Penn Station, the latest signal he will launch a presidential bid based in the city.

O'Malley plans to shutter the D.C. office of his political action committee, O'Say Can You See, and move 40 workers into space at 1501 St. Paul St. by the middle of next week, O'Malley spokeswoman Lis Smith said.

The historic Railway Express building, formerly a parcel post office, was once was owned by the city and redeveloped under O'Malley's tenure as Baltimore mayor. It currently houses nonprofits, professional offices, an architecture firm and loft apartments.

The lease, expected to be signed Friday, comes as O'Malley convenes Thursday evening with longtime Maryland staffers and supporters to discuss his imminent political plans. Aides said he is inclined to run for president, but has not made a final decision.

O'Malley, who left office in January after two-terms as governor following six years as Baltimore mayor, has toured early primary states, hired staff there and pitched himself as a progressive alternative to dominant Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton.

He has scheduled a May 30 announcement in Baltimore to reveal his political plans. Any potential run for president, he has said, will focus on his tenure in Baltimore.

If he chooses to run, he will face an uphill fight against Clinton, who dominates polls where O'Malley barely registers. Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders is also in the race.

Presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley hails US role in controversial war // The Guardian // Ben Jacobs - May 14, 2015

Another presidential candidate is waffling what he would do about a war of choice launched by a previous administration that ended with mixed results. But the war in question is not the 2003 invasion of Iraq.

The past few news cycles have been dominated by Jeb Bush's waffling on Megyn Kelly's question "Knowing what we know now, would you have authorized the invasion [of Iraq]?" in an interview on Monday night. Eventually Bush conceded on Thursday that, in hindsight, "I would not have gone into Iraq".

But the Iraq war is not the only war that the United States has initiated in its 239-year history.

One likely 2016 presidential candidate, the former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley is a well-known War of 1812 buff but, emulating Jeb Bush, he refused to take a stand on whether, knowing what we know now, he would support James Madison's decision to declare war on Great Britain in 1812.

However, he was very happy with the way the war ended. O'Malley told the Guardian in a statement: "Not sure I'd start it again but we would sure as heck finish it again."

The war began when the United States decided to respond to over a decade of British provocations – which included impressment of American sailors, support for Indian attacks on American settlements and restrictions on American trade – with a declaration of war. But the war was greatly controversial at the time and divided the country. Opponents of the war in New England even contemplated secession in protest.

Although the war started badly for the United States, eventually after American victories in Baltimore and in New Orleans, a peace agreement was reached after two and a half years and British provocations against the United States ceased. However, the United States failed in one of its key war aims, the invasion and annexation of Canada.

While O'Malley's statement is a dodge, it is in line with previous comments about the war. In a 2014 interview with the Daily Beast, the then Maryland governor said that while he believed the war was a win for the United States but thought it "was not necessarily a golden moment" in American history.

O'Malley Won't Criticize Stephanopoulos Over Clinton Foundation Donation // Daily Caller // Al Weaver - May 14, 2015

A spokeswoman for former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley's signaled Thursday that his impending presidential campaign isn't prepared to make an issue out of George Stephanopoulos's $50,000 donation to the Clinton Foundation.

"We've always found him to be fair," Lis Smith told The Daily Caller, referring to the ABC News anchor and former Clinton White House spokesman.

According to The Washington Post, O'Malley will likely join the Democratic primary against Hillary Clinton on May 30. He's reportedly set to make the announcement in Baltimore after having criss-crossed the early primary states since January.

Stephanopoulos did not tell viewers of the donation when he interviewed Peter Schweizer, the author of "Clinton Cash," which suggests donations to the Clinton Foundation and hefty speaking fees paid to Bill Clinton helped influence decisions made by Hillary Clinton during her tenure at the State Department.

O'who? What you should know about Hillary Clinton's most serious challenger // Fusion // Brett LoGiurato – May 14, 2015

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley is expected to announce at the end of this month what most assumed he had been gearing up for: a challenge to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton for the Democratic nomination for president.

His aides told reporters who had traveled along for a trip through New Hampshire on Thursday that he will likely tell donors and supporters in a conference call that he is "inclined to run," according to The Washington Post. His announcement will likely come around May 30 in Baltimore, where he served as mayor from 1999-2007.

Presidential speculation has followed O'Malley since 2012, when it wasn't yet clear if Clinton would seek the nomination. But despite about three years of jostling during his tenure as Maryland governor, he'll start well behind Clinton in the race and without much name recognition.

Some of his most fervent "support" to date has come from the reliably conservative Drudge Report, whose founder, Matt Drudge, is obviously pining for a liberal challenger to Clinton as well. Upon the news on Thursday O'Malley was getting ready to announce, The Drudge Report plastered a photo of O'Malley, shirtless and in running gear, on its banner.

He also might start behind an unexpected competitor for attention, as well — Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent from Vermont who announced late last month that he'd seek the Democratic nomination for president. The challenge for O'Malley, political strategists and political science professors said, is to paint himself as an electable Bernie Sanders — and a more progressive Hillary Clinton.

"He has absolutely nothing to lose and everything to gain by running," said Stella Rouse, the assistant director of the Center for American Politics and Citizenship at the University of Maryland, in an email. "He can play the contrarian to Hillary, hopefully gain some publicity and support (especially via the debates if he does well)."

But O'Malley, who always served as the presumed progressive alternative to Clinton, might need to do some work to just attain that status again. It's been Sanders who has gained real momentum in polls since his announcement.

Sanders jumped from 6 percent of the Democratic primary vote in April to 13 percent in May, according to surveys from Public Policy Polling. He's also seen similar spikes in support in key states like New Hampshire, where a poll found that at least one-third of the Democratic electorate was cramming for a more progressive nominee — be it Sanders or Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Massachusetts). In that same poll, from the University of New Hampshire, O'Malley was still stuck at the bottom with 2 percent.

Geoffrey Skelley, the associate editor of the University of Virginia Center for Politics' Crystal Ball, placed O'Malley behind Sanders in terms of viability in the center's newsletter on Thursday.

"Along with his policy views, Sanders' personal characteristics may also make him a potent 'protest' option for liberals in the Democratic primary," Skelley wrote. "He is assertive and knows precisely what he believes in — and is unabashed in expressing himself."

Rouse added: "He will have a tougher time carving out a spot to the left of Hillary Clinton now that Bernie Sanders is in the race."

Skelley described O'Malley as someone who "fits the profile of a more serious challenger to Clinton (or did at some point)."

The unrest in Baltimore, where protests sprang up amid the death of a 25-year-old black man in police custody, hasn't helped. Some of the tactics O'Malley instituted as Baltimore's mayor were criticized, and he found a mixed reception after he came back to the city from an overseas trip. The unrest rekindled a longstanding feud between O'Malley and David Simon, author and creator of The Wire. (Tommy Carcetti, the politically expeditious Baltimore mayor and Maryland governor in the show, is loosely based on O'Malley, Simon has said.)

"O'Malley has a very steep hill to climb. First, he left the Maryland governorship, pretty much with his tail between his legs. His approval numbers were underwater at 41 percent," Rouse said. "Second, the recent Baltimore riots did not help O'Malley. While he thought he could garner some positive publicity by 'returning home,' his policies of tough policing when he was Mayor of Baltimore came under scrutiny."

O'Malley has, however, become much more willing to challenge Clinton more directly recently. He has come out against a trade deal that most liberal Democrats oppose, as well as drawn a contrast and implied that she has hedged on her support for the deal in light of political expediency. Clinton helped craft the early stages of the deal as secretary of state, but has said more recently that she needs to see the final parameters before announcing her position.

Many progressives think he simply needs to get out his message to a wider audience. On the stump, he often talks about his progressive record as governor. He did the tax hikes on the wealthy. He did the minimum-wage hike. The death penalty is gone in Maryland. Gay couples can marry. Undocumented immigrants can qualify for in-state tuition. Health-care reform in Maryland has real legs and is in the midst of a revolution.

But does that message have a place anymore?

Said Rouse: “I think his message will easily get drowned out and he will have a tough time getting that message out there and gaining any campaign traction.”

The Field Is Flat // National Journal // Charlie Cook – May 15, 2015

The field for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination is as flat as any in modern memory—pretty remarkable for a party that usually has a fight but almost invariably ends up nominating whoever's turn it is. While nomination trial-heat polling tells us very little this early, there are some poll questions that are better measurements of at least where these candidates are starting out, before the campaigning, debates, and advertising begin in earnest.

An April 26 to April 30 NBC News / Wall Street Journal poll asked Republican primary voters whether they could or could not see themselves voting for each of 10 different potential candidates. Marco Rubio topped the list, with 74 percent saying they could see themselves supporting him. Second was Jeb Bush with 70 percent; Scott Walker was third with 61 percent; Rand Paul was fourth at 59 percent; Ted Cruz was fifth at 57 percent; and Mike Huckabee was sixth with 52 percent. So six candidates had more than half of GOP primary voters open to voting for them. (Rick Perry, Ben Carson, Chris Christie, and Carly Fiorina rounded out the group with 45, 39, 38, and 17 percent, respectively.)

A CBS News / New York Times poll from April 30 to May 3 took a similar approach, asking whether the respondents would consider or not consider 14 different potential GOP candidates. Rubio led this list as well with 48 percent; Huckabee was second with 47 percent; Bush was third at 46 percent; Cruz had 40 percent; Perry had 39 percent; Paul had 35 percent; Carson had 33 percent; Walker had 32 percent; Rick Santorum and Chris Christie both had 27 percent; Bobby Jindal had 24 percent; John Kasich had 15 percent; Lindsey Graham had 12 percent; and Fiorina had 11 percent.

Tightening the focus a little more, a March Pew Research survey of Republican voters and GOP-leaning independents asked respondents whether there was a "good chance," "some chance," or "no chance" that they would vote for 10 different candidates. An astonishing seven different candidates had between 21 and 23 percent of respondents saying "good chance": Bush, Rubio, and Walker tied for first place with 23 percent, Huckabee and Cruz were next with 22 percent, and Paul and Carson followed at 21 percent. That's a very tight pack.

Expanding to those who had half or more of Republicans saying "good chance" or "some chance," six potential candidates made the cut: Bush (64 percent), Huckabee (61 percent), Paul (57 percent), Rubio (55 percent), Cruz (54 percent), and Perry (53 percent).

What also becomes apparent from reading these surveys is that even the most scrupulously honest pollsters can get fairly different results based on exactly what question they ask and what group they are polling. Looking at Republicans only is one thing; including Republican-leaning independents can bring a very different result. This matters because, in some states, independents are allowed to vote in party primaries, and, in other states, they cannot. National polls have a hard time accounting for this discrepancy, particularly now that area codes don't necessarily indicate where someone actually lives and votes.

The flatness of this field combined with a system awash in money—with just a single billionaire able to keep a candidate in the race—should make for an exceedingly volatile Republican campaign, one that is absolutely impossible to predict.

Pataki to Announce Decision on White House Run on May 28 // AP – May 14, 2014

Former New York Gov. George Pataki will announce May 28 in New Hampshire whether he intends to seek the Republican nomination for president, he said Thursday.

He made the announcement on social media and the MSNBC show "Morning Joe."

"I have no doubt that when I lay my ideas out there and go through my background and what I've been able to do, people will say this is a guy who could lead our country well," Pataki said on MSNBC.

Pataki has made repeated visits to New Hampshire since saying in January he was considering a White House campaign. He said then that the nation can't risk electing another Democratic president. He has campaigned against the Affordable Care Act and criticized President Barack Obama's decision to use an executive order to offer protections against deportation to millions of immigrants living in the country illegally.

Pataki, 69, flirted with running in 2008 and 2012 after serving as New York's governors from 1995 to 2006. He has cited his electoral success in the heavily Democratic state and ability to work across the aisle as strengths.

"No one thought I had a chance," Pataki said. "So the odds don't deter me."

Since leaving office he has launched a consulting firm and joined Chadbourne & Parke, a New York City-based law firm.

Silver State looks to play in 2016 election // CNN // Ashley Killough - May 14, 2015

Reno, Nevada (CNN)Jeb Bush has his eyes on Nevada -- a state that is aiming to become a bigger player in presidential politics.

Bush's attention -- and that of the growing Republican field -- could result in more competition here after much of the 2008 and 2012 presidential field ignored the state, despite its fourth-in-the-nation nominating status.

Bush, who hopes to appeal to Nevada's ever-growing Hispanic voting bloc, visited the state for the second time since March on Wednesday, just days after hiring well-regarded strategists to run his Nevada operation.

His visit is among stops made by a throng of other White House hopefuls who are hoping to seize momentum in a state dominated by Mitt Romney and Ron Paul in the past two contests.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nevada didn't become an early-voting state until 2008, so the past two cycles have also been experimental -- and Republicans here will tell you the caucuses didn't go so well. "Confusing" and "complicated" are two words thrown around to describe the process. The state party is now pushing for a primary instead in 2016.

Thanks to support from the state's Mormon population, Romney won more than 50% of the caucus vote in 2008 and 2012, while Paul struck a chord with the state's more libertarian faction and won over a slate of delegates.

But with Romney off the ticket this cycle, Nevada's caucuses are wide open, and White House hopefuls are making the Silver State a more significant part of their calculation. Bush made Nevada his first early-state stop this year when he road-tested his stump speech in March, before going on to Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina.

"You're part of the big four in February. It's hugely important," Bush told local reporters after he held a town hall in Reno on Wednesday morning.

During the event, Bush told the crowd of about 150 people that he "had a blast" campaigning for his father in Nevada during the general elections. But he was quickly corrected on his pronunciation of the state. Like many out-of-staters, Bush pronounced the state's name "Nev-AH-da" at the top of his speech.

"Nev-AD-a," members of the audience shouted out.

"Nev-AD-a," he repeated back. "Well, got that out of the way. Thank you."

Further signaling his interest, Bush hired two well-regarded Republican operatives: Ryan Erwin, a top adviser to Nevada Rep. Joe Heck, who won re-election last year in a swing district, and a strategist from Erwin's firm, Scott Scheid.

The ground game in Nevada is certainly no cakewalk. While voters are largely concentrated in the Las Vegas and Reno areas, a sizable portion of Republican caucus-goers live in the rural areas of the sparsely populated state that covers 110,000 square miles.

"It'll be interesting to see how the candidates play that strategy," said David Damore, a political science professor at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas. "If you advertise in Vegas, you're getting three-fourths of the voters, but the most Republican parts of the state are the hardest to reach."

For Bush, Nevada also provides a bit of a blank slate. The state's presidential preference vote wasn't in play during the campaigns of his father and brother, so there's no significant primary history for Bush to compete with or live up to -- unlike in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina. (Since Nevada is a swing state, however, his father and brother both competed here during the general elections.)

Also of note, Nevada Gov. Brian Sandoval is, like Bush, a big backer of Common Core and can provide Bush with cover as he treads through strong sentiments against the controversial testing standards. Sandoval endorsed then-Gov. Rick Perry early on in the last cycle, but it's unclear whether he'll choose a candidate this time around, given that he could run to replace retiring Sen. Harry Reid on Capitol Hill.

The Nevada governor's support will nonetheless be courted.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Answering questions about whether Bush is considering Sandoval as a potential running mate, Bush told reporters Wednesday that he's a "big fan" of the governor.

"I enjoy our friendship," he said, but added, "It's way premature for someone who is considering running to be talking about that."

And with the sixth-most populous Hispanic electorate in the country, Nevada gives Bush further incentive to showcase his ties to the Hispanic community. Bush and his wife, who's from Mexico, lived in Venezuela when they were younger and now live in South Florida. Bush is fluent in Spanish and stands by his unpopular push for a path to legal status for undocumented workers.

While Bush meets resistance over his immigration proposal from Republican primary voters in other early-voting states, Damore expects "he'll get a pass" in Nevada because the issue is less of a fiery topic in the state, where more than one-quarter of the population is Hispanic.

"Immigration is not an animating issue here like taxes or the scope of government," Damore said.

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, who's also angling to compete for Hispanic voters, lived in Las Vegas when he was younger and recently brought on Nevada Lt. Gov. Mark Hutchison as his state chairman. The son of Cuban immigrants, Rubio has said he still has family in Southern Nevada, where his father worked as a bartender at the Sam's Town Hotel and his mother worked as a housekeeper at the Imperial Palace hotel.

"We have great affection for Nevada," Rubio told the Las Vegas Review-Journal when he visited the state in February during his book tour. "We look forward to coming back many times."

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, however, has been perhaps the most organized on the ground in Nevada, with an infrastructure that he in part inherited from his father's presidential campaigns. While Romney snagged a majority of the vote in the 2012 caucuses, Paul ultimately won more delegates, and they protested loudly at the Republican National Convention later that year.

It's because of that situation that the state GOP chairman is now pushing for Nevada to hold a primary instead of a caucus. "It was a total disaster the way it was handled. It was an embarrassment for the state," Nevada GOP Chairman Michael McDonald told the Washington Examiner.

A primary, however, could potentially dilute the pro-Paul activists who are still organized at the caucus level and attract a broader pool of voters -- a setback for Paul but a potential benefit for candidates like Bush.

But Team Rand doesn't see it as a problem.

"Rand can and will compete in whatever selection process chosen by the people of Nevada," said Doug Stafford, a top Paul adviser.

At the Bush town hall, one woman asked the former governor how he plans to unite the divided party in Nevada. Bush said Republicans aren't always going to agree with one another but that they need to focus on winning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We need to get back to 'How do you get to 50?'" he said. "My focus will be on not turning back and getting into a food fight with people that might not agree with me completely — put on your big boy pants and take it."

Other White House hopefuls have visited the state in part to court support from Republican megadonor and casino titan Sheldon Adelson, who supported Newt Gingrich and who's known for his staunch support of Israel. Last month, Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and Perry flocked to the Republican Jewish Coalition's spring meeting in Vegas.

In addition to his town hall in Reno on Wednesday, Bush headlined the Clark County Republican Party's Lincoln Day dinner at the Orleans Hotel in Las Vegas. Ben Carson was also in town on Wednesday night to headline a dinner that raises money for Opportunity Village, a nonprofit that helps people with intellectual disabilities.

"This time, I think we're going to be hugely competitive," said Aaron Sims, who's running for mayor of Carson City. "You're going to see a lot more of the percentage of the vote being divided among these candidates."

Meet the College Democrat Who Told Jeb Bush: 'Your Brother Created ISIS' // ABC News // Alana Abramson - May 14, 2015

Jeb Bush found himself on defense after his town hall meeting in Reno, Nevada, Wednesday after a young voter told him, "Your brother created ISIS."

Ivy Ziedrich, a 19-year-old student at University of Nevada who said she was a registered Democrat, approached Bush after the event and told the likely presidential candidate he was wrong about the origins of the terror group:

"You stated that ISIS was created because we don't have enough presence and we've been pulling out of the Middle East. However, the threat of ISIS was created by the Iraqi coalition authority, which ousted the entire government of Iraq. It was when 30,000 individuals who are part of the Iraqi military were forced out. They had no employment, they had no income, yet they were left with access to all the same arms and weapons. Your brother created ISIS!"

Bush, the former Florida governor and likely Republican presidential candidate, unsuccessfully tried to interject. When he reached out, Ziedrich snapped back: "You don't need to be pedantic to me sir. You could just answer my question."

"We respectfully disagree," Bush said, explaining his view that more American troops in Iraq would have prevented ISIS from forming.

"So look, we can rewrite history all you want, but the simple fact is that we're in a much more unstable place because America pulled back," he told Ziedrich.

Ziedrich said she is a member of the Young Democrats at her university, although in an interview with ABC News Wednesday she said she was not speaking as a representative of the group. She said she likes to attend political events across the ideological spectrum so she can be as informed as possible. She said she did not intend to come across as hostile in her exchange with Bush, which occurred after the town hall meeting had concluded. She added that she respects Bush as a politician.

"I think he's telling the truth as he understands it," Ziedrich said in a telephone interview. "I think it's important when we have people in positions of authority we demand a dialogue and accountability."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She added: “I see his response as a lack of perspective. We deserve more than this as voters.”

Will Ziedrich make an appearance at similar events?

“If there are other town halls here, and if any presidential candidate comes to an open event, I would love to attend,” she told ABC News.

Jeb Bush Reverses Himself: ‘I Would Not Have Gone Into Iraq’ // TIME // Zeke J. Miller - May 14, 2015

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush sought to turn the page on a week of terrible press coverage Thursday, telling a group of Arizona voters that knowing what is known now, he would not have launched the 2003 Iraq War.

“Knowing what we know now I would not have engaged—I would not have gone into Iraq,” Bush said, in reference to his greatest liability—the unpopular war launched by his brother, former President George W. Bush.

It was the latest turn in a tumultuous week that began with an interview with Fox News host Megyn Kelly on Saturday in which he said he would have supported going to war, even knowing that the Iraqi government did not possess weapons of mass destruction. “My mind kind of calculated it differently,” Bush later explained, saying he misheard Kelly’s question.

On Wednesday, Bush dodged the same question Kelly asked him days earlier, saying he wouldn’t answer “hypotheticals” and that the question did a “disservice” to the memories of the 4,491 American war dead.

But that didn’t put the questions to rest, Bush’s Republican opponents lined up to criticize him for the comments, while Democrats gleefully used the opportunity to tie him to his brother.

“If we knew then what we know now and I were the President of the United States, I wouldn’t have gone to war,” New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie told CNN Tuesday. Sen. Rand Paul told the Associated Press that Bush’s comments represent “a real problem if he can’t articulate what he would have done differently.”

“Knowing what we know now, of course we wouldn’t go into Iraq,” Sen. Ted Cruz told The Hill.

Sen. Marco Rubio went even further in an interview Wednesday at the Council on Foreign Relations. “Not only would I have not been in favor of it, President Bush would not have been in favor of it. He said so,” he said.

Bush’s reversal may put the controversy to rest temporarily, but it only further highlights the challenges the entire Republican field with respect to talking about the conflict.

In a gaggle with reporters after his remarks, Bush maintained that the war was “worth it” for the families of the war dead.

“It was worth it for those families,” he said. “It was worth it for the people that made major sacrifices. In 2008 Iraq was stable. It was fragile, but it was stable. It was because of the heroic efforts of a lot of people. And re-litigating this and going through hypotheticals I think does no good to them."

Bush said that after the rise of the Islamic State of Iraq and Greater Syria (ISIS), the U.S. must "re-engage" in Iraq beyond what President Obama has done.

"I think we need to re-engage and do it in a more forceful way," Bush said. "The president is very reluctant for whatever reason to make a clear commitment that we should have kept 5,000, 10,000 troops there."

He acknowledged that there has been success countering ISIS since Obama ordered airstrikes and deployed trainers to assist Iraqi forces last year, but said more has to be done. "We can't do it by drones. We have to be there to train the military and to do the things that are being done right now. And I believe that if we had stayed the course in that, if we do, we will be successful."

Why Jeb Bush Had to Ditch Dubya // The Daily Beast // Matt Lewis - May 14, 2015

George W. Bush was able to successfully show us where he split with his dad. The future of Jeb's candidacy depends on his ability to pull off a similar trick.

A while back, my friend and boss, Tucker Carlson, refused to condemn his brother for some inappropriate comments that were accidentally made public. "You know what, if my brother committed a mass murder, I would not criticize him in public," Carlson later explained. "He's my brother. Period. Under no circumstances will I criticize my family in public—ever. That's the rule, and I'm not breaking it."

As an only child, I can't fully identify with this fraternal loyalty. But I respect the hell out of it. It's a dangerous world, and if your brother doesn't have your back, who will? But there are consequences to adhering to this sort of code. And right now, Jeb Bush is finding out that his reluctance to publicly criticize and break with his brother could potentially doom his presidential bid.

On Thursday he finally pulled the trigger and stated the obvious: No, he now says, he wouldn't have invaded Iraq given what we know now. It was an important moment in his campaign. It was also flat-footed—his fourth answer to the question in a week—and probably didn't go far enough. But it had to be said.

In the last 48 hours or so, we've seen Ted Cruz, Chris Christie, Marco Rubio, Ben Carson, and John Kasich all say that—knowing what we know now—the war was a mistake. And, of course, Rand Paul has been pushing this line all along (without need of the "knowing what we know now" caveat). Jeb lagged far behind the rest of the field on what should have been an easy question.

But of course—because the man who ordered the invasion was his brother—Jeb finds himself in a unique situation. And so, he spent several news cycles failing to adequately answer a serous question about what might be the most important foreign policy decision of the early 21st century.

Jeb's "I'm my own man" act was, of course, never going to fly. Not without proof. And it wouldn't have flown for Dubya, either, even though his father—the last Republican president (you always have to distance yourself from the last guy)—wasn't as much of an albatross in 2000 as W. is today. In fact, a big part of the reason Dubya succeeded is that he broke with his dad, who still had a toxic reputation on the right, what with the tax hike and the disdain for "voodoo economics" and the losing to Bill Clinton.

Poppy made his bones in the GOP as a pro-choice moderate, an ally of Nixon and Ford; George W. ran as the personification of the religious right.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In all theatre, including politics, the first rule is show, don't tell. And George W. Bush didn't just tell us he was different; he showed us he was different. He spoke differently. He wasn't a WASP from the northeast; he was a born-again evangelical from Texas. "There is a higher father that I appeal to," he once told Bob Woodward. Poppy made his bones in the GOP as a pro-choice moderate, an ally of Nixon and Ford; George W. ran as the personification of the religious right.

And guess what? It worked. George W. Bush managed to get elected and, unlike his dad, re-elected. In one fell swoop, Dubya avenged his father's defeat at the hands of Bill Clinton—by simultaneously disowning his father. Jeb's reluctance to make a similar break with his brother's legacy cost him dearly this week, and despite his comments on Thursday, it will dog him for months.

Granted, what Dubya pulled off was a difficult trick. Despite sending the aforementioned signals to everyone that he would be more like Reagan than his own old man, he never completely threw Poppy under the bus. In fact, it was pretty clear that he loved his dad, even as he surrounded himself with Poppy's old enemies like Don Rumsfeld. And then, just as he would do what his dad couldn't do electorally, he would also finish the job in Baghdad.

Not to play Maureen Dowd pop psychologist here, but how much of the last few decades can be explained by the psychological need to avenge George H.W. Bush's presidency—not by means of revisionist history, but by means of reliving it … getting it right this time?

The irony, of course, is that 41 did a good job of winding down the Cold War and effectively neutering Saddam. As you'll recall, after H.W. Bush managed to assemble an impressive coalition, and refused to get bogged down in some quagmire. But no good deed goes unpunished. He wins a war, and some lecherous hillbilly from Arkansas takes his job? And to add insult to injury, Saddam tried to have Poppy assassinated.

So here you have this interesting psychology whereby George W. Bush is willing to publicly distance himself from dear old dad, do things dad wouldn't approve of, in order to avenge him. This would be fascinating enough, were it not for John Ellis Bush.

Another weird twist to this story is that Jeb, always the favorite son, is probably more like 41 than 43 in temperament and outlook. And maybe that means that, had Jeb been elected president in 2000, instead of his brother, he wouldn't have gotten us involved in the Iraq War, while he simultaneously lacks the killer instinct to tell us that. Maybe—just as 41 had the governing skills, but lacked the political instincts that might have made him a two-term president—Jeb Bush is just too decent a guy to get elected.

But here's the bottom line: Jeb has to really distance himself from his brother, albeit in some respectable manner, if he wants to be president. He needs us to show us how he's different, what he'd do differently, and where he and his brother diverge on issues both foreign and domestic. Where does he stand on the bailouts, the massive growth in government spending, the Medicare expansion, and all the other facets of the Bush presidency that still anger conservatives? He has to make a break with all that if he wants to make it to the nomination and, ultimately, the White House.

This insanely difficult choice—whether to stay with his brother or leave him behind—will largely define Jeb's candidacy. The Bushes have always prized loyalty, but for Jeb, absolute loyalty to his brother—and winning the presidency—might be mutually exclusive. Some presidents would run over their own mother if that's what it takes to win an election. What is Jeb willing to say about his brother's policies—if push comes to shove?

Rubio shows his prowess at CFR // WaPo // Jennifer Rubin – May 14, 2015

Appearing at the Council on Foreign Relations for a speech (hyped a tad too much) billed as introducing his "doctrine," Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) gave a strong but not novel address on military strength, the U.S. economy and moral clarity. His strongest passage came with regard to the third:

In recent years, the ideals that have long formed the backbone of American foreign policy – a passionate defense of human rights, the strong support of democratic principles, and the protection of the sovereignty of our allies – have been replaced by, at best, caution, and at worst, outright willingness to betray those values for the expediency of negotiations with repressive regimes.

This is not only morally wrong, it is contrary to our interests. Because wherever freedom and human rights spread, partners for our nation are born. But whenever our foreign policy comes unhinged from its moral purpose, it weakens global stability and forms cracks in our national resolve.

In this century, we must restore America's willingness to think big – to state boldly what we stand for and why it is right. Just as Reagan never flinched in his criticisms of the Soviet Union's political and economic repressions, we must never shy away from demanding that China allow true freedom for its 1.3 billion people. Nor should we hesitate in calling the source of atrocities in the Middle East by its real name – radical Islam.

As president, I will support the spread of economic and political freedom, reinforce our alliances, resist efforts by large powers to subjugate their smaller neighbors, maintain a robust commitment to transparent and effective foreign assistance programs, and advance the rights of the vulnerable – including women and the religious minorities that are so often persecuted – so that the afflicted peoples of the world know the truth: the American people hear their cries, see their suffering, and most of all, desire their freedom.

It was a refreshing change from the false choice (really, pandering to the far right) between national interest OR human rights posed by candidates like Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Tex.). As Rubio said, defending human rights is in our national interest.

The most impressive part of Rubio's appearance, by leaps and bounds, was the Q&A. He ignored moderator Charlie Rose's posturing and distracted glances, his feigned astonishment that anyone could find the Iran deal a bad idea and his inept efforts to interject his opinions. Rubio calmly responded to tough questions on everything from Guantanamo (if you take up arms to kill Americans, we have the right to take you off the battlefield) to his fundamental difference with the president (President Obama sees the United States as the cause of friction and unrest in the world) to Iraq (unlike Jeb Bush, he crisply said he would not have gone to war if he had known about the absence of WMDs and neither would George W. Bush) to his criticisms of Hillary Clinton (Russian reset, allowing Libya to fall into chaos) to his view of the two-state solution (it's the ideal but circumstances now do allow for it). He has substantive knowledge at a level of detail only Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) among the other contenders possesses, but he is also able to speak with clarity and purpose. You know where he stands and why, and he is an effective and civil persuader, even if you don't always agree.

Rubio clearly passes the knowledge test on foreign policy and aces the "creative domestic policy ideas" part of the extended job interview with the voters (that's what an election is, after all). If he keeps giving performances like this, he may very well overcome worries about his youth and lack of executive experience. As to the latter, he'd do well to not just show off his knowledge but relate something about his life that demonstrates the sort of decision-making skill, tenacity, sound judgment and refusal to bend to conventional wisdom we expect in a president. Nevertheless, other presidential hopefuls should watch out: He's likely to catch them trying to fudge their way through the debates. They had better come prepared.

Like Jeb Bush, Marco Rubio Has Evolved on Iraq Question // ABC News // Erin Dooley - May 14, 2015

Over the course of the last few days, likely Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush has showcased an evolving position on whether he would have authorized the invasion of Iraq in 2003 "knowing what we know now" about faulty intelligence at the time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But, as it turns out, it is also a question that has vexed one of possible rivals for the Republican presidential nomination, Florida Sen. Marco Rubio.

Jeb Bush: 3 Days, 4 Different Answers About Iraq

Why Jeb Bush Isn't Keeping Marco Rubio Out of the 2016 Race

Asked on Wednesday whether he would have supported the invasion of Iraq in 2003 had he known the country did not possess weapons of mass destruction, Rubio added his voice to the chorus of Republican presidential hopefuls who have said "no" this week.

"Not only would I not have been in favor of it, President Bush would not have been in favor of it -- and he said so," Rubio told Charlie Rose after a speech at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York.

"I don't think the Congress would have voted in favor of the authorization" had they not relied on faulty intelligence, he added.

But Rubio's comments this week appear to differ from his assertions on Fox News' "The Five" in March.

When asked a somewhat different question: Whether it was "a mistake to go to war in Iraq," Rubio responded, "no, I don't believe it was."

"The world is a better place because Saddam Hussein doesn't run Iraq," he said. "We don't know what the world would look like if Saddam Hussein was still there. But I doubt it would look better ... it would be worse, or just as bad for different reasons."

His response this March was very similar to what Rubio said during a Florida U.S. Senate debate in October 2010.

Asked by the moderators whether America was "safer and better off for having gone to war in Iraq," Rubio answered: "I think the answer ultimately is yes. First of all, the world is better off because Saddam Hussein is no longer in charge in Iraq."

Rubio's allies argue that the senator's comments don't actually contradict one another. Condemning the war's justifications and appreciating its outcomes are not mutually exclusive, they say.

Meanwhile, Bush -- who has not yet declared his candidacy but is expected to do in the near future -- has answered the question five different ways in just four days.

When asked in an interview that aired on Monday by Fox News' Megyn Kelly: "Knowing what we know now, would you have authorized the invasion" of Iraq in 2003, Bush initially responded: "I would have and so would have Hillary Clinton, just to remind everybody, and so would almost everybody that was confronted with the intelligence they got."

Subsequently, Bush said he misheard the initial question. And at a town hall meeting in Arizona on Thursday, he came full circle.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If we're all supposed to answer hypotheticals," Bush said, "I would not, have engaged, I would not have gone into Iraq."

UPDATE: In an interview a New Hampshire radio station Thursday evening, Rubio clarified that he has been answering “two separate questions.”

“The first is if, what I was asked yesterday by Charlie Rose, is if you knew that there weren't weapons of mass destruction, would you have gone forward? And the answer is no one would have,” he said on New Hampshire Now.

“If you believed that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction that they could have passed on to terrorists; that they could have used to massacre their people and start a regional arms race - you absolutely have to to do that,” he added.

“We still would have had to deal with Saddam Hussein, but obviously would have done so differently. The Presidents don't get that luxury. The President has to act on what he is told at the time,” he said. “And so it was not a mistake in the sense that the President made the right decision based on what he believed and had reason to believe, at that time.”

An Open Letter To Marco Rubio: I Am Ashamed I Ever Worked On Your Behalf // Western Journalism // KrisAnne Hall - May 14, 2015

Mr. Rubio,

I have read your opinion piece published on May 10, 2015. I understand that this is your opinion, but I am puzzled how you can hold these opinions and still claim to be conservative member of a party that claims to be supporting the Constitution.

Specifically, you claim that the Patriot Act and the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act are essential to the protection of our “national security” and that we must continue these clear violations of our 4th Amendment and our Right to Liberty to keep us “safe.” To the contrary, with these “permissible” intrusions, we have seen a massive increase in power of government in general and the power of the executive in particular, increased control over the people, and a decreased respect for the Rights of the people throughout America. Faisal Shahzad, the Boston Bombing, and the Garland Shooting are clear examples of when the government was continually monitoring these “terrorists” and still allowed the violence to occur; so tell me again how critical it is to do away with the 4th amendment?

You claim that “Bulk metadata includes phone numbers, the time and duration of calls — nothing else. No content of any phone calls is collected.” You contradict your own claims in the very next sentence: “The government is not listening to your phone calls or recording them unless you are a terrorist or talking to a terrorist outside the United States.” (emphasis mine) What you are truly telling America is that the government IS listening to our phone calls AND recording them–but “trust us, it’s only when we think you are a terrorist.” I’m sorry, sir; I cannot garner that much trust for my government–and you should not suggest you expect it. May I remind you that on two separate occasions, the DHS and DoD have declared the definition of “terrorist” to be so broad as to include many within the Republican party!

“Rightwing extremism in the United States can be broadly divided into those groups, movements, and adherents that are…rejecting federal authority in favor of state or local authority, or rejecting government authority entirely. It may include groups and individuals that are dedicated to a single issue, such as opposition to abortion or immigration.” This report also claims “return of military veterans…could lead to the potential emergence of terrorist groups or lone wolf extremists capable of carrying out violent attacks." DHS Office of Intelligence &

Analysis Assessment April 7, 2009

"Nowadays, instead of dressing in sheets or publicly espousing hate messages, many extremists will talk of individual liberties, states' rights, and how to make the world a better place." January 2013, DoD Training on Extremism

Knowing that these are the OFFICIAL definitions of a "terrorist," how can you possibly expect Americans to trust this government with such a gross violation of our Liberties?

Your statement that "Despite recent court rulings, this program has not been found unconstitutional, and the courts have not ordered a halt to the program" is disingenuous at best and borders on complete propaganda. Production of just one case contrary to your claims shows your dishonesty. I will give three:

On March 15, 2013, U.S. District Judge Susan Illston declared that the Patriot Act section 2709 "violates the First Amendment and the separation of powers principle…The government is therefore enjoined from issuing NSLs under 2709 or from enforcing the nondisclosure provision in this or any other case."

On December 16, 2013, U.S. District Judge Richard Leon entered "an order that bars the Government from collecting, as a part of the NSA's Bulk Telephony Metadata Program, any telephony metadata associated with their personal Verizon accounts and (2) requires the Government to destroy any such metadata in its possession that was collected through the bulk collection program."

On May 7, 2015, a three judge panel consisting of Circuit Judges Sack and Lynch, along with District Judge Broderick, ruled that the National Security Agency program that is systematically collecting Americans' phone records in bulk is illegal, stating that "the telephone metadata program exceeds the scope of what Congress has authorized and therefore violates § 215."

In these three court cases, we have seen that actions taken under the Patriot Act have been deemed unconstitutional and illegal, bulk metadata collection has been ordered to a halt, and the National Security Agency's exercise of section 215 of the Patriot Act has been deemed illegal.

Mr. Rubio, you then try to justify these false claims by clarifying that "In fact, this program has been found legal and constitutional by at least 15 federal judges serving on the FISA Court on 35 occasions." This is simply more propaganda intended to deceive the public. Who are the FISA Courts?

They are federal courts appointed by the federal government whose only job is to review "applications submitted by the United States Government for approval of electronic surveillance, physical search, and other investigative actions for foreign intelligence purposes."

"Most of the Court's work is conducted ex parte as required by statute, and due to the need to protect classified national security information."

Consideration of the Constitution is secondary to national security needs. (See Rule 5(a))

So let's get this straight, Mr. Rubio: you expect the American people to be comforted by the fact that 15 federal judges, appointed by the federal government, whose rules and procedures by definition place national security over the Rights of the people, and whose judgments are held in secret with no accountability, have determined the government's actions to be legal? Tell me again how you believe in the bedrock principles of America. One of your flowery speeches quoting the founders while you pander to real conservatives who haven't figured out who you are should do nicely.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You claim that “There is not a single documented case of abuse of this program.” Not a single “documented” case of abuse in a system shrouded in secrecy, hidden by “national security” claims, conducted ex parte, protected with gag orders? Wow! That indeed is impressive. I would find your argument more credible if you simply start yelling, “I AM OZ; pay no attention to that man behind the curtain, you young whippersnapper!”

Your Alinsky-like use of threats of future violence puts you in dubious company, to say the least. Don’t you guys get tired of trotting out some boogeyman to scare the people into trading Liberty for a false sense of security? Every attack that gets through your vaunted dragnet is used by you as proof that we need to sacrifice more and more liberty. Somehow, we are supposed to believe that the reason some nutjob blows something up is that the people are too free! Your opinion (demonstrated by your rhetoric) that the Constitution is outdated, that the founders were ignorant fools, is the very thing I labor to combat every day. I am ashamed of ever having worked on your behalf. You have been a sincere disappointment to say the least.

Here are some words that you, Mr. Rubio, should take to heart: “The very word ‘secrecy’ is repugnant in a free and open society; and we are as a people inherently and historically opposed to secret societies, to secret oaths and to secret proceedings. We decided long ago that the dangers of excessive and unwarranted concealment of pertinent facts far outweighed the dangers which are cited to justify it.” John F. Kennedy

You, sir, are a cheerleader for the very thing JFK wisely warned Americans to guard against. I don’t care whether you call yourself Senator or President; your used car sales pitch for security is not worth my son’s Liberty. And you, sir, ought to be ashamed of yourself.

Sincerely,

KrisAnne Hall

The small surprises in Marco Rubio’s big foreign policy speech // WaPo // Daniel W. Drezner - May 14, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) has migrated from sorta sounding like a hawk to really sounding like a hawk over the past four years. And his big speech Wednesday at the Council on Foreign Relations was about as neoconservative as a foreign policy speech could get.

How neoconservative was it? He hit all of the neocon erogenous zones: bashing the Iran deal, bashing China, bashing terrorism, supporting Israel, emphasizing the need for American leadership and so forth. The full text of his speech actually capitalized the phrase “American Strength” all nine times it appeared, like it was a special status that either American Express or American Airlines was rolling out.

So if you like neoconservative foreign policy, you should be very happy with Rubio’s speech; if you don’t like it, you should be very scared.

So that was the Big Takeaway. But the other, not-completely-neocon-y notes in Rubio’s speech also stood out to me. In particular:

1) Rubio’s emphasis on foreign economic policy. In articulating why foreign policy mattered, Rubio said flat out, “The prosperity of our people now depends on their ability to interact freely and safely in the international marketplace.... Today, as never before, foreign policy is domestic policy.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It this boilerplate? A little. But it's boilerplate that's been noticeably lacking from other GOP presidential candidates. Rubio used this point to support the Trans Pacific Partnership while attacking Hillary Clinton for her squeamishness regarding that trade deal.

Also interesting was Rubio's second pillar, the protection of the American economy in a globalized world:

As president, I will use American power to oppose any violations of international waters, airspace, cyberspace, or outer space. This includes the economic disruption caused when one country invades another, as well as the chaos caused by disruptions in chokepoints such as the South China Sea or the Strait of Hormuz.

Russia, China, Iran, or any other nation that attempts to block global commerce will know to expect a response from my administration.

This "protecting the global commons" plank makes some sense, and it's conceptually sensible and politically smart to lump together Iranian activity in the Straits of Hormuz with Russian and Chinese cyberattacks.

What makes much less sense is the implication that either Russia or China has an interest in blocking global commerce (in fact, if you want to get technical about it, it's the United States and European Union that are currently blocking Russia from much of the global economy). And the precise way to "use American power" seems important to flesh out.

Still, as a first principle goes, it's OK.

2) Rubio's approach to Russia in 2016 is somewhat more sober than Romney in 2012. Republicans are fond of claiming Romney's strategic acumen with respect to Russia. And it's not like Rubio thinks Vladimir Putin is a big pussycat. But when asked a softball question about Russia during the Q&A, Rubio's take was — wait for it — sober.

He pointed out that Putin wanted Russia to be a great power on a par with China or the United States, but that this was economically impossible, particularly after the imposition of U.S.-EU sanctions. Instead, Putin's actions in Ukraine and the rest of the near-abroad were compensating for his economic weakness.

Again, this isn't shocking news to anyone paying attention. But given the GOP's man-crush on Putin over the past year, it's comforting to hear a clear-eyed, non-hyperbolic assessment of Russia's actual strengths and weaknesses from a Republican.

3) Rubio is genuinely interested in foreign policy.

As Yahoo's Meredith Shiner noted, "the question-and-answer session after Rubio's address to the Council on Foreign Relations in New York provided an even more interesting glimpse into the thinking of a candidate."

The glimpse I got was of someone who was genuinely interested in foreign affairs. I didn't agree with a ton of what he said, but his responses on Syria and Cuba suggested that he did have a clear and consistent worldview.

I wrote something about Gov. Scott Walker (R-Wis.) a few months ago that applies to the entire GOP field, "This isn't about whether Walker should profess a more dovish or hawkish foreign policy posture. This is whether he wants to sound like a smart hawk or a dumb hawk."

Rubio's a hawk — like the rest of the GOP potentials. He's a hawk who has made the occasional gaffe. But he's not dumb, and unlike most of the rest of the GOP field, he does not need to play catch-up on foreign affairs. And given the importance that national security will play in the GOP primary, that is a decided advantage for the senator from Florida.

Ted Cruz: I Won Those Purple Hearts! // The Daily Beast // Patricia Murphy – May 15, 2015

The senator claims on the campaign trail that he was the reason the Fort Hood soldiers shot in a 2009 attack were awarded Purple Hearts. Why that's stretching the truth just a tad.

Sen. Ted Cruz's presidential stump speech electrifies conservative crowds with a cocktail of growls, whispers, warnings of impending doom, and at least one claim of personal accomplishment so powerful, it often brings many in the audience to their feet.

"Just a few weeks ago, I was down in Fort Hood, where the soldiers who were shot by Nidal Hasan were finally, finally, finally awarded the Purple Heart," Cruz told activists last weekend at the conservative Freedom Forum in Greenville, S.C. "I'll tell you the reason those Purple Hearts were awarded. I was very proud last year to introduce legislation in the Senate to mandate that the Pentagon award those Purple Hearts."

Cruz rightly pointed out that for years, the Obama administration had classified the 2009 shooting at Fort Hood, Tex., by Army Maj. Nidal Hasan as a "workplace violence" incident rather than as a terrorist attack, though Hasan's rampage came after he had been in contact with al Qaeda leader Anwar al-Awlaki. Hasan's shooting spree left 13 dead and 32 wounded, including dozens of military personnel who were deemed ineligible for the Purple Heart because of the Pentagon's classification of the attack as not combat-related.

At the end of 2014, Congress passed a bill requiring the Pentagon to reclassify the 2009 attack, and the Fort Hood victims were indeed awarded the Purple Heart.

But Cruz voted not once but twice against the Pentagon authorization bill that changed the Purple Heart policy. A Cruz spokesman told the Dallas Morning News that Cruz voted against the bill over an issue unrelated to the Fort Hood shootings but that "he would have found another way to get it done" had the bill had not passed. "Supporting one amendment certainly does not mean a senator is obligated to support the entire bill."

And although Cruz played an important role on the Senate Armed Services Committee at last year, the credit for changing the Pentagon's long-standing policy belongs to at least a dozen senators and members of Congress who had pushed the issue relentlessly for years before Cruz ever arrived in the Senate.

"The claim nonetheless omits what Lieberman, Cornyn and others had done to get the ball to the one-yard line."

It was Sen. John Cornyn (R-TX), not Cruz, who originally introduced legislation to award the Purple Heart to the Fort Hood victims in 2009. Cornyn's bill coincided with a similar bill from Rep. John Carter (R-TX), whose district includes much of Fort Hood. Cornyn and Carter would introduce their bills again in 2011 and 2013. Rep. Roger Williams (R-TX), Frank Wolf (R-VA), and Peter King (R-NY) all pushed the matter in their own committees.

Rep. Michael McCaul, another Texas Republican and the chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, held hearings on the matter. Sen. Joe Lieberman (I/D-CT), the former chairman of the Senate Homeland Security Committee, did the same and commissioned a months-long investigation into the causes of the Fort Hood attack.

Lieberman introduced a bill of his own, along with Cornyn, in 2012 to mandate that the Pentagon change its criteria for awarding the Purple Heart that would include the Fort Hood victims. In 2014, Sen. John Boozman, a Republican from Arkansas who is also on the Armed Services Committee, wrote legislation similar to Cruz's to mandate that the Pentagon award Purple Hearts to victims of a similar shooting at a Little Rock military recruiting center in 2009.

Neal Sher, a lead attorney for the Fort Hood victims and their families who sued the Pentagon over the policy, said the reclassification was the result of efforts by multiple offices for multiple years on and off Capitol Hill.

"Cruz was instrumental, Cornyn was instrumental, the Texas House delegation, McCaul, Carter, Williams, were all instrumental," said Sher. "It took years, years. The administration and the Pentagon were opposing it every step of the way. It took an act of Congress to get them to change their tune."

A staffer who worked on the issue agreed that Cruz did play an important part in the final result for the families, but "the claim nonetheless omits what Lieberman, Cornyn and others had done to get the ball to the one-yard line. In other words, 'the reason those Purple Hearts were awarded' phrase is true but insufficient. "

It's not the first time Cruz has claimed credit for something on the campaign trail that has raised eyebrows back in Washington.

Cruz ran into a buzz saw with Sen. John McCain last month after the Texas senator told a New Hampshire audience that he had been pressing McCain to hold congressional hearings to allow members of the military to carry personal firearms on military bases. Cruz suggested that McCain had yet to respond.

McCain said Cruz had never spoken with him about it at all.

"Ask him how he communicated with me because I'd be very interested. Who knows what I'm missing?" McCain said to a group of reporters in the Capitol, according to The Hill. "Maybe it was through some medium that I'm not familiar with. Maybe bouncing it off the ozone layer, for all I know. There's a lot of holes in the ozone layer, so maybe it wasn't the ozone layer that he bounced it off of. Maybe it was through hand telegraph, maybe sign language, who knows?"

Cruz later acknowledged he "may have misspoken" about his outreach to McCain. Cruz's office did not respond to requests for comment on his Fort Hood remarks.

Chris Christie shrugs off doubts, hires two top campaign aides // Politico // Alex Isenstadt – May 14, 2015

Despite sagging poll numbers and lingering fallout from the Bridgegate scandal, Chris Christie continues to take steps to run for president in 2016.

The New Jersey governor has made two new hires for his prospective campaign, bringing on Tom Dickens to serve as his national field director and Hayden Stone to be his national director of data and analytics, according to a source familiar with the moves.

Christie has maintained a high profile in the two weeks since two of former top aides were indicted for their roles in the George Washington Bridge scandal, returning to the campaign trail and to the media circuit. Last weekend, Christie traveled to New Hampshire — a state seen as critical to his 2016 prospects — where he told an audience that he was done apologizing for the episode and that he was moving on. This week, he sat for an interview with CNN, where he tweaked former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush for his fumbled answers on whether he supported the Iraq war invasion.

On Friday morning, Christie will headline a Georgia Republican Party breakfast.

Behind the scenes, he has continued to build out his campaign team in anticipation of a possible launch in early summer. Dickens most recently served as the deputy national victory director for the Republican National Committee during the 2014 midterms and before that was political director on Christie's successful 2013 reelection bid. Stone served as a data and field staffer for the RNC during the midterms and before that as a political director for the Colorado Republican Party.

The two will join the rest of Christie's political team, which has been working for Christie's political action committee, Leadership Matters for America. The organization has office space in Morristown, N.J.

It was also recently announced that Tucker Martin, a past spokesman for former Virginia Gov. Bob McDonnell, will work for a super PAC that's been set up to support Christie's would-be candidacy.

Rick Santorum Says He's Baffled by Jeb Bush on Iraq // NYT – First Draft // Mike Barbaro – May 14, 2015

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz — Rick Santorum, the former senator from Pennsylvania who delivered a surprisingly strong performance in the 2012 presidential campaign and may run again in 2016, said Thursday he was baffled by Jeb Bush's handling this week of a question about the 2003 war in Iraq.

"I don't know how that was a hard question," Mr. Santorum said at a Republican National Committee meeting here.

At one point, Mr. Santorum suggested that Mr. Bush might not be entirely ready for the campaign. "If you are not prepared for it, I think we've seen in the past, you are not going to do very, very well. This is a long process."

Mr. Santorum said he was confused about why Mr. Bush, the former governor of Florida, took so long to backtrack on remarks suggesting that he would have authorized the Iraqi invasion even if he knew about the intelligence failures at the time. Mr. Bush later said he had misunderstood the question, then said he would not answer hypothetical questions.

On Thursday, Mr. Bush finally said that he would not have authorized the invasion had he known about the intelligence failures.

Mr. Santorum seemed disappointed.

“I’ve been asked that question a hundred times,” he said. “The answer is pretty clear. The information was not correct and, while there was some things that were true, I don’t think nearly the weight to require us to go to war. Everybody accepts that now.”

Mr. Santorum concluded with a bit of a dig at Mr. Bush.

“I don’t know how anyone could look at that question and not — his brother even said in his own book that he would have done something differently,” Mr Santorum said.

Russ Feingold Running For Senate In 2016 // Huffington Post // Amanda Terkel - May 14, 2015

WASHINGTON -- Progressive Democrat Russ Feingold announced Thursday that he will run for Senate in 2016, hoping to win back the seat he lost six years ago.

Feingold made his announcement in a video that was provided in advance to The Huffington Post. In it, he cites issues near and dear to his heart, like taking on corporations and big money in politics, as his justification for running.

"People tell me all the time that our politics and Washington are broken. And that multi-millionaires, billionaires and big corporations are calling the shots," Feingold says in the video. "They especially say this about the U.S. Senate, and it’s hard not to agree. But what are we going to do? Get rid of the Senate?

“Actually, no one I’ve listened to says we should throw in the towel and give up -- and I don’t think that either," he adds. "Instead, let’s fight together for change. That means helping to bring back to the U.S. Senate strong independence, bipartisanship and honesty."

The race will be a rematch between Feingold and Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.), who defeated him during the tea party wave of 2010. Feingold ran what was widely considered to be a lackluster race that year, and many Democrats have stressed that 2016 needs to be different.

But there are several factors working in Feingold's favor this time around: Democratic turnout tends to spike in presidential election years, and recent polls have underscored that Johnson is one of the most vulnerable sitting GOP senators.

A Marquette Law School poll released in mid-April found Feingold leading Johnson by 16 points in a hypothetical match-up, and a March poll by Public Policy Polling found Feingold ahead of Johnson by 9 points.

Johnson brushed off the poll results during an interview last month, saying, "I'm not worried about it. I'll leave other people to do the evaluation. I think it's pretty much meaningless at this point in time."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A longtime opponent of special interests in politics, Feingold co-authored the landmark campaign finance law that the Supreme Court gutted in 2010's Citizens United decision.

Feingold was also known for staking out sometimes lonely positions on national security. In 2001, he was the only senator to vote against the Patriot Act, which greatly expanded the federal government's surveillance powers. He was also one of the 23 senators who voted against the war in Iraq.

After his Senate loss, Feingold started Progressives United, a group dedicated to combating corporations' influence on the political system. From July 2013 until March 2015, he served as the State Department's special envoy for the Great Lakes Region of Africa.

Anticipating a tough race, Republicans began attacking Feingold even before he announced he was running. The Wisconsin GOP launched a website called RadicalRussFeingold.com and told reporters that he has a "voting record of supporting one disastrous policy after another."

Senate, in Reversal, Begins Debate on Trade Authority // NYT // Jonathan Weisman - May 14, 2015

WASHINGTON — Two days after Democratic senators blocked it, the Senate easily voted on Thursday to begin debating legislation to grant the president accelerated negotiating power to complete an expansive trade accord with 11 other nations on the Pacific Rim.

The 65-33 vote came two hours after senators gave broad approval to legislation that cracks down on countries that the United States says manipulate their currency rates, putting bipartisan pressure on House leaders to take up a measure that President Obama argues could scuttle delicate Pacific trade talks.

The trade votes on Thursday were starkly different from the first effort to take up the issue on Tuesday. Then, Senate Democrats united against even considering so-called trade promotion authority, rebuking their own president and holding out for assurances that tough trade enforcement provisions be attached to that authority.

What they got instead was a compromise to allow the currency provision to come to a vote in a separate bill that now faces an uphill climb. Even if a bipartisan majority can pressure Speaker John A. Boehner of Ohio to allow a House vote, the White House has expressed opposition. A formal White House statement of policy on Thursday, however, stopped short of a veto threat.

“Under our plan, the Senate will avoid the poison pills that had been floated in favor of the very type of bipartisan approach we’ve been advocating for all along,” Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the majority leader, said. “It allows senators to express themselves without endangering more American trade jobs for the people we represent.”

House GOP partly funds Obama police camera initiative after recent deaths // US News // Andrew Taylor, Associated Press - May 14, 2015

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Barack Obama's request for police body cameras and new community policing initiatives would be partially funded under legislation advanced Thursday by Republicans controlling the House. Lawmakers also moved to slash legal aid for the poor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The actions follow violence sparked by the recent deaths of black men at the hands of law enforcement in Baltimore, South Carolina and Ferguson, Missouri, that focused attention on police conduct and distrust between minority communities and the officers assigned to protect them.

Most of the $50 million fund to improve police-community relations next year would go to grants to states to assess and improve their justice systems. The amount is about one-third of what Obama asked for in February, according to a panel Democratic aide. Some $15 million would go to help local police departments buy body cameras that would record interactions with the public, half of Obama's request.

The developments came as a House panel gave initial approval to a $51 billion measure funding the Justice and Commerce departments and science programs under the umbrella of NASA and other agencies.

Thursday's legislation covers the budget year beginning in October.

The bill is caught in an ongoing battle over agency budgets between the GOP-controlled House and Senate and Obama and his Democratic allies. Tight spending "caps" imposed under so-called sequestration are forcing Republicans to, on average, freeze domestic agency budgets at current levels. But they've evaded a freeze on the military by using war accounts as a special resource to give the Pentagon a 7 percent, $38 billion increase.

The bill's author, Republican Rep. John Culberson of Texas, went after a series of familiar GOP targets. The Legal Service Corporation, which gives legal aid to the poor, would bear a $75 million cut, or about 20 percent. A grant program for hiring local police would be eliminated, while increases for the upcoming decennial Census would be shortchanged.

Culberson acknowledged that many of the cuts would be reversed if more funding is made available by a budget deal later this year, and he praised the new community policing initiative as a step toward "doing everything we can to restore the bond of trust that has to exist between police officers and local citizens." He said that state officials will determine who can get access to videos from body cameras, and he warned that the federal government won't take on the expensive job of helping pay for storing them.

Culberson's legislation would award NASA, important to his Houston-area district, a $519 million budget increase, a 3 percent hike that raises its budget to $18.5 billion.

Amtrak Says Shortfalls and Rules Delayed Its Safety System // NYT // Michael Shear – May 14, 2015

WASHINGTON — The Amtrak train that derailed in Philadelphia on Tuesday night was equipped with an automatic speed control system that officials say could have prevented the wreck, which killed eight passengers and injured hundreds. But the system, which was tantalizingly close to being operational, was delayed by budgetary shortfalls, technical hurdles and bureaucratic rules, officials said Thursday.

In 2008, Congress ordered the installation of what are known as positive train control systems, which can detect an out-of-control, speeding train and automatically slow it down. But because lawmakers failed to provide the railroads access to the wireless frequencies required to make the system work, Amtrak was forced to negotiate for airwaves owned by private companies that are often used in mobile broadband.

Officials said Amtrak had made installation of the congressionally mandated safety system a priority and was ahead of most other railroads around the country.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the railroad struggled for four years to buy the rights to airwaves in the Northeast Corridor that would have allowed them to turn the system on.

"The transponders were on the tracks," said one person who attended a Thursday morning briefing for congressional staff members. "But they also said they weren't operational, because of this ongoing spectrum issue."

Despite the delays, the system may have been just months from being operational when Northeast Regional Train No. 188 careered into a sharp curve at over 100 miles per hour, twice the posted speed, and hurtled off the tracks Tuesday night. The Federal Communications Commission had approved Amtrak's application for the purchase of wireless spectrum from an entity called Skybridge Spectrum Foundation on March 5, clearing the way for final tests on the system, a spokeswoman for the commission said.

If the system had been operational, "there wouldn't have been this accident," said Representative Robert A. Brady, Democrat of Pennsylvania.

Since the crash, Amtrak has come under sharp questioning about why positive train control was not already in operation. Addressing those concerns in a news conference Thursday, Joseph H. Boardman, Amtrak's chief executive, confirmed that the system was close to the testing phase, adding that he expected that the technology would be operational throughout the Northeast Corridor by the end of the year.

"We're very close to being able to cut it in," Mr. Boardman said. "We've got to do testing on MHz radios. We will complete this by the end of the year."

Mayor Michael A. Nutter of Philadelphia said Thursday that the remains of an eighth victim of the Amtrak derailment had been found and that all passengers had been accounted for.

Questions about the technology surfaced just hours after the crash when Robert L. Sumwalt, a member of the National Transportation Safety Board, which is investigating the crash, said positive train control would have prevented the accident. The safety board said the train had been traveling at 106 miles per hour. On Thursday, the board said the train had accelerated rapidly just before it hit the turn.

Positive train control refers to a system of software and hardware technology, including radio transponders, antennas, locomotive and track equipment, that communicate real-time information about train speed and location to engineers and train dispatchers.

The technology is supposed to prevent accidents like head-on collisions or derailments caused by excessive speed by alerting operators about a potential danger, such as an object on the tracks or dangerous curve, and stopping the train automatically if needed.

The crash spotlighted other possible shortcomings in Amtrak's safety system, officials said. The stretch of track where Train 188 crashed heading north was equipped with an older automatic braking system, but only on the southbound side, an official briefed on the investigation said. Some senior Amtrak officials did not become aware that the braking system had not been installed on the northbound side until after the train derailed.

A spokeswoman for the railroad said Thursday that the decision not to install the system on the northbound stretch of track had been made in the 1990s and reflected the maximum allowable speeds in each direction. Trains approaching Philadelphia from New York can travel as fast as 110 miles per hour, Amtrak said, and face a steeper decrease in allowable speed heading into the curve than trains traveling from Philadelphia toward New York.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The train's speed was normal until minutes before it derailed.

OPEN Map

In addition, Train 188 was equipped with a second safety system designed to ring buzzers and bells in the engine's cabin if the engineer does not touch the steering panel for a short period, people briefed on the investigation said. The system, which is intended to prevent crashes when engineers doze off or become distracted, is supposed to stop the train automatically if the engineer does not touch the steering panel after the alarms have sounded.

But officials did not explain in the congressional briefing whether the buzzers were operational on Train No. 188 or why they would not have stopped the train before the accident, according to two people who attended.

Still, several federal officials and safety experts defended Amtrak's record. Many pointed out that the railroads was one of the few in the United States that were on schedule to meet a federal deadline to have positive train control technology operational before the end of the year.

"Amtrak has been in a leadership role on this," said Mark Rosenker, a former chairman of the safety board. "They were talking about positive train control when I was at the board."

Railroads other than Amtrak, particularly freight railroads, have been much slower to implement these systems, citing the technological challenges, shortages in equipment and the availability of radio spectrum, among other issues.

"The sad irony in this accident is that Amtrak is further along than almost anybody in reaching their deployment of positive train control," said Joseph C. Szabo, a former administrator of the Federal Railroad Administration. "They have been very steady and very committed. So much has been done."

Edward R. Hamberger, chief executive of the Association of American Railroads, said railroads would not complete the installation of all systems for positive train control until the end of 2018. After that, he estimated, it will take about two years to test that all components of the system work together correctly.

To date, he said, railroads have installed the technology on about 8,200 miles of tracks, out of 60,000 miles where the technology is federally required. At the end of last year, about 15 percent of locomotives were fully equipped, and railroads had installed about 56 percent of the track systems.

Railroad officials said Thursday that installation of the safety system on tracks across the country was also hampered for more than a year by longstanding F.C.C. rules that required environmental and preservation reviews before the safety system's antennas could be installed in historic areas or near tribal lands.

But officials at the F.C.C. said those reviews, which were relaxed at the behest of members of Congress in 2014, were not specifically responsible for Amtrak delays along the largely urban Northeast Corridor because new antennas were not required in that region.

Representatives Jeff Denham and Bill Shuster urged rail safety reform on Wednesday in a Transportation Committee meeting the day after a deadly Amtrak derailment in Philadelphia.

Kim Hart, a spokeswoman for the commission, said the delays in approving installation of the antennas for the safety system are now largely gone. She said new procedures allow the commission to accept applications for up to 1,400 antennas from railroad companies every two weeks,

The commission also defended its handling of Amtrak's petition to acquire wireless frequencies, asserting that it had taken Amtrak three years to negotiate the purchase and that the commission had approved the deal within days.

Money has also been an issue in implementing positive train control.

The Federal Railroad Administration has calculated the cost of the system at $52,000 per mile of track. The railroads have put a total price tag of more than $9 billion on the system and said they have spent $5.2 billion so far. One of the biggest problems is that the system needs to be interoperable, meaning that communication is necessary between equipment used by different railroads, even if the railroads use different types of equipment.

The Federal Railroad Administration twice sought extra funding from Congress to finance the technology for Amtrak and other commuter rails. A first request for $825 million was ignored. A second request for extra funding was made this year for the 2016 budget as part of the Department of Transportation's Grow America budget.

"Clearly, one of the hurdles that Amtrak has and the commuter rail industry has is that this is very expensive technology," Mr. Szabo said. "It was never funded. The failure to invest in Amtrak's capital program clearly has been a hindrance in more timely deployment. The way to make public rail a priority would be with public funding."

On Capitol Hill, House Speaker John A. Boehner angrily rejected a suggestion that Republican funding decisions contributed to the accident.

"That's a stupid question," he snapped at a reporter. "Adequate funds were there, no money's been cut from rail safety, and the House passed a bill earlier this spring to reauthorize Amtrak and authorize a lot of these programs."

House passes Iran review bill, sending it to Obama's desk for signature // WaPo // Paul Kane - May 14, 2015

The House gave overwhelming approval Thursday to create a congressional review of the potential nuclear power deal with Iran, sending the bill to the White House for President Obama's signature as he heads into the final weeks of negotiations with the Islamic state.

Following a similar lopsided roll call last week in the Senate, the House's 400-to-25 vote concluded months of tense talks between congressional leaders and administration officials over what degree of oversight Congress would have if Obama finalizes a deal with Iranian leaders to assure their nuclear program shift into military use.

Obama agreed to the slightly modified version drafted by Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.), chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, after three months of negotiations led a large number of Democrats to support the plan.

"In a show of bipartisanship that is often too rare today in Washington, Republicans and Democrats in both the House and the Senate now have sent a strong message that the American people – through their elected representatives – must have a voice on any final nuclear deal with Iran," Corker said in a statement after Thursday's House vote.

If Obama finalizes a pact with Tehran, this legislation grants Congress 30 days to review the nuclear deal. Obama could waive sanctions against Tehran that were imposed by the executive branch but must leave in place sanctions that Congress previously drafted.

If the House and the Senate disapprove of the Iran deal, including overcoming a possible presidential veto, then Obama must leave in place those congressionally mandated sanctions. Any other outcome in Congress would allow Obama to go ahead with implementing all aspects of any nuclear deal.

A bloc of House conservatives were angered when GOP leaders placed the legislation on the fast-track calendar that prohibited any amendments, leading 19 Republicans to vote against the Corker bill. Six Democrats who want Obama to have a free hand in his deal-making also opposed the bill.

Senate conservatives nearly derailed the legislation with similar efforts to amend the bill, which Corker maneuvered against because that would have lost most Democratic support and drawn a presidential veto.

In the end, those supporting Obama's effort to reach a deal and those opposing it largely approved of some congressional review. "It is a true bipartisan compromise that will give Congress the opportunity to review and play an active role in evaluating any agreement with Iran," Rep. Adam Smith (D-Wash.), the ranking member of the House Armed Services Committee, said.

"The bipartisan legislation the House passed today is the only way Congress will have that opportunity," House Speaker John A. Boehner (R-Ohio), who opposes Obama's effort, said in a statement.

Defying U.S., Colombia Halts Aerial Spraying of Crops Used to Make Cocaine // NYT // William Neuman - May 14, 2015

BOGOTÁ, Colombia — The government of Colombia on Thursday night rejected a major tool in the American-backed antidrug campaign — ordering a halt to the aerial spraying of the country's vast illegal plantings of coca, the crop used to make cocaine, citing concerns that the spray causes cancer.

The decision ends a program that has continued for more than two decades, raising questions about the viability of long-accepted strategies in the war on drugs in the region.

Colombia is one of the closest allies of the United States in Latin America and its most stalwart partner on antidrug policy, but the change of strategy has the potential to add a new element of tension to the relationship.

Just last week, American officials warned that the amount of land used to grow coca in Colombia grew by 39 percent last year as aerial spraying to kill or stunt the crop, already a contentious issue here, declined.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The folks who run counternarcotics never want to give up any of their tools, and there are pockets of discontent inside the U.S. government with this decision,” said Adam Isacson, a senior associate of the Washington Office on Latin America, a research group.

“Colombia and the United States have been in lock step on a hard-line approach” in how to fight drug trafficking, he added. “It’s the first time there’s been light between the two countries on what the strategy should be, in recent memory.”

The decision to halt the spraying, which was backed by President Juan Manuel Santos, came after an agency of the World Health Organization declared in March that the herbicide used here, a chemical called glyphosate, probably causes cancer in humans.

The chemical, the active ingredient in the popular weedkiller Roundup, is the most widely used herbicide in the world. Colombian officials have said that a previous Supreme Court ruling in their country called for an end to the spraying if health concerns involving the chemical were found.

The United States Environmental Protection Agency has determined that there is a “lack of convincing e vidence” to consider it a cancer risk to humans.

Before Thursday’s decision, the United States had pressed the Colombian government to continue the spraying program. The American ambassador in Bogotá, Kevin Whitaker, published an op-ed article in El Tiempo, one of the country’s main newspapers, over the weekend, defending the program.

But he has also stressed that Colombia’s decision would not harm diplomatic relations.

“This is their sovereign decision to make, and we will respect that and we will continue to use the tools that are available to us, as Colombia wishes us to do, to continue to be a partner with them in this fight,” Mr. Whitaker said in an interview a day before the decision was taken.

“We have lots of tools to help Colombia address the problem of transnational crime and narco-trafficking.”

He said that includes providing intelligence on drug traffickers, encouraging farmers to grow other crops, intercepting drug shipments, focusing on shutting down drug labs and supporting efforts to pull up and destroy coca plants by hand.

Thursday’s decision involved only the use of the herbicide in the coca spraying program. The government has not moved to ban use of the herbicide by farmers who grow legal crops and use it to kill weeds.

The spraying program was steeped in controversy even before the declaration was made in March by the International Agency for Research on Cancer.

Colombia is the only coca-producing country that uses airplanes to spray and kill the crop. The other major producers, Peru and Bolivia, have shunned spraying.

Critics of spraying in Colombia said that it was harmful to the health of rural residents and that it caused environmental damage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The spraying also alienated the poor farmers who have often felt that they had little choice but to grow coca to feed their families.

But opponents of the spraying ban have argued that ending spraying could lead to a boom in cocaine production and favor traffickers and rebel groups like the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, or FARC, which depends on the drug trade for much of its financing and has advocated an end to spraying.

They have also pointed out that one alternative, eradicating plants by hand, is dangerous because it involves sending troops and workers into areas controlled by traffickers and guerrilla troops. Many eradication workers have been killed and wounded by land mines or in armed confrontations in drug-growing areas.

Spraying with glyphosate began in the 1990s on a small scale and by the early 2000s it was established as a crucial aspect of Plan Colombia, a multibillion dollar push by the United States to aid in fighting rebel groups and drug traffickers in the country.

It reached its peak in 2006, when more than 405,000 acres were sprayed, according to data compiled for the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy.

But aerial spraying has fallen sharply over the last two years, even as coca plantings jumped. Last year, 137,000 acres were sprayed, while the amount of land planted with coca increased to 276,758 acres in Colombia, compared with 198,919 acres the previous year.

Daniel Mejía, the director of the Center for Security and Drug Studies, a research group in Bogotá, said that spraying was inefficient and counterproductive.

“I would recommend attacking the links in the chain of drug trafficking, the labs where cocaine is processed, the large shipments of chemicals, which is really where the hard drug trafficking is, where organized crime is,” Mr. Mejía said. “It has been shown that attacking the farmers doesn’t work.”

Rafael Nieto, a former vice-minister of justice, questioned the rationale behind halting spraying, saying that more eradication workers would be put at risk.

“If the spraying is stopped, the income of the drug traffickers, the criminal gangs and the guerrillas will go up substantially and so will the number of dead and wounded,” Mr. Nieto said. “Coca and cocaine production would also go up, and there would be more addicts and more people will die.”

The impact of the decision on the peace talks underway between the government and the FARC are uncertain. Some critics of the decision say that it removes a critical element of pressure on the group that could help push it toward a deal to lay down its arms.

The two sides have reached a preliminary deal on cooperating to fight drug trafficking, which would go into effect if an overall peace deal is reached. It calls for the government to work with rural communities to help them grow legal crops and increase government services in those areas. It says that spraying could be used only as a last resort.

On Monday, the government said that the armed forces had raided 63 illegal mines operated by the FARC to extract gold and other minerals. It said shutting down the mines would take away millions of dollars in monthly income for the group.

Ancient Ruins at Palmyra Are Endangered by ISIS Advance in Syria // NYT // Anne Barnard and Hwaida Saad - May 14, 2015

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Islamic State militants advanced to the outskirts of the Syrian town of Palmyra on Thursday, putting the extremist group within striking distance of some of the world's most magnificent antiquities.

That raised fears that the ancient city of Palmyra, with its complex of columns, tombs and ancient temples dating to the first century A.D., could be looted or destroyed. Militants from the Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL, have already destroyed large parts of ancient sites at Nimrud, Hatra and Nineveh in Iraq. Islamic State leaders denounce pre-Islamic art and architecture as idolatrous even as they sell smaller, more portable artifacts to finance their violent rampage through the region.

The fighting on Thursday took place little more than a mile from the city's grand 2,000-year-old ruins, which stand as the crossroad of Greek, Roman, Persian and Islamic cultures.

People in Palmyra described a state of anxiety and chaos, with residents trying to flee the northern neighborhoods. Shelling could be heard in the background as they spoke over Skype. According to residents and one government soldier, fighting elsewhere, scores of soldiers and pro-government militiamen fighting in the east and north of the town had been killed by Islamic State fighters since Monday.

"People are scared, staying home, we're hearing loud noises outside but we don't know what's happening," said Mohammad, who runs an antiques shop near the gates of the ancient ruins and who asked to be identified only by his first name to protect his safety. "If the roads were safe, we would leave the town, but pray for us, and pray for peace."

The soldier and the Syrian Observatory for Human Rights, a monitoring group based in Britain, said that civilians had also been killed, some of them beheaded, in the town of Soukhna several miles outside Palmyra.

Maamoun Abdulkarim, Syria's director of antiquities, said that the treasures of Palmyra, a Unesco World Heritage site, were in serious danger. "If I.S. enters Palmyra, it will spell its destruction," Mr. Abdulkarim told Agence France-Presse. "If the ancient city falls, it will be an international catastrophe."

The advance on Palmyra, also known as Tadur, gave the Islamic State more control over the highway from the town to the eastern province of Deir al-Zour and parts of a sprawling gas field. It comes at a time when the government of President Bashar al-Assad has faced new challenges in the seemingly implacable civil war. A coalition of rival insurgent groups recently wrested the northern provincial capital of Idlib from government control.

The soldier, who asked not to be named for fear of government reprisals, had served with a Syrian government unit in Palmyra and said his comrades, trapped in Sukhna, called him when they were attacked.

"I could feel the fear in their voice," he said. "They told me they ran out of ammunition."

He said he later saw some of his fellow soldiers' identification cards posted online by Islamic State fighters who participated in the battle.

Khaled al-Homsi, an antigovernment activist who monitors damage and looting of antiquities in Palmyra, said the sites had been threatened and damaged by fighters from all sides of the Syrian conflict.

Mr. Homsi, who uses a pseudonym to protect his safety, said that in the past two weeks, officials in Palmyra had removed the smaller artifacts from the state antiquities museum, apparently in preparation for a possible militant onslaught, but they had not warned residents to leave.

“People are already losing faith in the government; if they gave such a warning it would be even worse,” he said.

Mr. Homsi said that on Thursday he saw two government airstrikes hit near the medieval citadel that sits on an outcropping above the ancient city.

Nidal, an employee of the antiquities museum in Palmyra, which is within sight of the citadel, said in a brief phone interview that the citadel was unharmed. “I’m not leaving the museum,” he said.

Migrants From Myanmar, Shunned by Malaysia, Are Spotted Adrift in Andaman Sea // NYT // Thomas Fuller and Joe Cochrane - May 14, 2015

IN THE ANDAMAN SEA OFF THAILAND — A wooden fishing boat carrying several hundred desperate migrants from Myanmar was spotted adrift in the Andaman Sea between Thailand and Malaysia on Thursday, part of an exodus in which thousands of people have taken to the sea in recent weeks with no country willing to take them in.

Cries of “Please help us! I have no water!” rose from the boat as a vessel carrying journalists approached. “Please give me water!”

The green and red fishing boat, packed with men, women and children squatting on the deck with only plastic tarps to protect them from the sun, had been turned away by the Malaysian authorities on Wednesday, passengers said.

They said that they had been on the boat for three months, and that the boat’s captain and crew had abandoned them six days ago. Ten passengers died during the voyage, and their bodies were thrown overboard, the passengers said.

“I am very hungry,” said a 15-year-old boy, Mohamed Siraj, who said he was from western Myanmar. “Quickly help us please.”

It was unclear Thursday whether they would receive that help, however, despite the presence of a Thai Navy vessel, which arrived after being alerted to the boat’s presence by The New York Times.

Instead, the presence of an estimated 6,000 to 20,000 migrants at sea, fleeing ethnic persecution in Myanmar and poverty in Bangladesh, has created a crisis across the region, with countries pointing fingers at one another and declining to take responsibility themselves.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Most of the migrants were thought to be headed to Malaysia, but after more than 1,500 came ashore in Malaysia and Indonesia in the last week, both countries declared their intention to turn away any more boats carrying migrants.

Thai officials have not articulated an official policy since the crisis began, beyond convening a regional conference to discuss the problem this month. Thailand is not known to have allowed any of the migrants to land there.

The Indonesian Navy turned away a boat with thousands of passengers on Tuesday, urging it on to Malaysia, while the Malaysian authorities turned away two boats with a total of at least 800 passengers on Wednesday.

The Thai naval vessel that approached the migrant ship here on Thursday kept its distance, with its commander, Lt. Cmdr. Veerapong Nakprasit, saying the migrants had “entered illegally.” At one point, the Thai sailors tossed packages of instant noodles to the boat, though the migrants appeared to have no means to cook them.

“What we have now is a game of maritime Ping-Pong,” said Joe Lowry, a spokesman for the International Organization for Migration in Bangkok. “It’s maritime Ping-Pong with human life. What’s the endgame? I don’t want to be too overdramatic, but if these people aren’t treated and brought to shore soon, we are going to have a boat full of corpses.”

The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has asked regional governments to conduct search and rescue operations to no avail. “It’s a potential humanitarian disaster,” said Jeffrey Savage, a senior protection officer with the agency.

Many of the migrants are believed to have been abandoned by their traffickers with little food or water.

Indonesia’s chief military spokesman, Maj. Gen. Fuad Basya, said Thursday that the military would “push back any boat that wants to enter Indonesian waters without permission, including those of boat people like the Rohingya.”

After Malaysian officials turned back a boat with about 500 people off Penang Island on Wednesday, Deputy Home Minister Wan Junaidi said, “What do you expect us to do?”

“We have been very nice to the people who broke into our border,” he told The Associated Press. “We have treated them humanely, but they cannot be flooding our shores like this. We have to send the right message that they are not welcome here.”

Malaysian officials reached by The Times on Thursday declined to comment.

Tens of thousands of Rohingya, a stateless Muslim ethnic group, have fled Myanmar over the last several years, most going to Malaysia or Bangladesh. But the exodus over the last few weeks seemed to have caught everyone by surprise.

There is no single reason for the spike in departures from Myanmar and Bangladesh, said Chris Lewa, coordinator of the Arakan Project, a human rights group that tracks migration in the Andaman Sea. For the Rohingya, an accumulation of setbacks has taken a toll, she said, including the tightening of fishing permits, which has hit the Rohingya monetarily and nutritionally, and the government’s insistence that its one million Rohingya residents are not citizens.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It’s a combination of things,” Ms. Lewa said. “Their lives have become worse and worse.”

The fact that so many are at sea at once, however, may be in part an unintended consequence of the Thai crackdown on human trafficking. After the discovery of a mass grave this month believed to contain the bodies of 33 Burmese and Bangladeshi migrants, officials raided several smuggling camps in southern Thailand and charged dozens of police officers and senior officials with being complicit in the trade.

The camps were way stations where migrants were often detained in prisonlike conditions until they or their family could pay smugglers for passage to Malaysia. As horrid as those camps were, without them, the migrants have been stuck at sea, their traffickers afraid to set foot in Thailand.

“Their business model has been interrupted by the operations in Thailand,” Mr. Lowry said. “They will be back eventually — smuggling in trafficking is very lucrative — but they are waiting for now.”

Migrants generally pay about $1,800 each for passage to Malaysia, along with the promise of a job when they arrive, Ms. Lewa said.

But they are frequently shaken down for more payments along the way, and many never make it to Malaysia, a Muslim country that until recently had tacitly allowed the backdoor migration of Muslims from Myanmar and Bangladesh.

Interviews with passengers aboard a boat that washed ashore on the northern tip of Sumatra Island, Indonesia, on Sunday provided a glimpse of the brutal conditions they faced at sea and the desperation that drove them to make the risky voyage.

Passengers told of waiting on the boat for months before it sailed because the smugglers wanted to pack it as full as possible with paying passengers.

Most were forced to remain beneath deck in the hold, squatting no more than an inch from the person in front of them. Every other day, they were fed bits of rice and noodles and small amounts of water. A hole in the floor, opening directly into the ocean, served as a toilet.

The passengers prayed or talked quietly, their whispers broken by the occasional sound of others vomiting from seasickness.

“There was no singing, only crying,” said Muhammed Kashim, a 44-year-old Bangladeshi.

Seven days into the voyage, the ship’s Thai captain abruptly stopped the vessel at sea, they said. The next day, gunmen arrived on a speedboat, boarded the ship and robbed migrants of their valuables.

The captain and crew fled with the gunmen, abandoning the ship.

Mahammed Hashim, 25, a Rohingya from the Kyauktaw District in Rakhine State, said the risks of traveling in a rickety wooden ship with little food or water were less than those of remaining in Myanmar.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We assumed that danger would come, but there was no other way,” he said. “We were living in a country that is more dangerous than the sea.”

They were lucky. A day later, the boat grounded in Indonesia, whose policy is not to turn back ships once they have made landfall.

The 584 passengers, including 59 children and 86 women, five of them pregnant, will have the opportunity to apply for refugee status with the United Nations refugee agency, a process that is expected to take months. For now, they are being housed at a government compound in Paya Bateung, in Aceh Province, where they sleep on concrete floors but have blankets, food and water.

The Rohingya, effectively stateless, have a reasonable chance at asylum. But the 208 Bangladeshis in the group will probably be considered economic migrants who, denied the right to work in Indonesia, will eventually choose to return home, Mr. Savage of the United Nations said.

Mahammed Jahangir Hussein, a 32-year-old Bangladeshi, said that was not an option. His father sold a house and farmland to raise the $3,250 he paid for the voyage and a promised job in Malaysia.

“If the Indonesian government says we cannot work, all the men here are saying, ‘Let’s work in another country,’ ” he said. “There’s nothing back home for us.”

Asked about his future, he waved his arms toward the migrants gathered around him and up at the scruffy concrete building he had just moved into.

“This is my future,” he said.

End Immigration Detention // NYT // Editorial Board – May 15, 2015

Of all the malfunctioning parts in the country’s broken-down immigration machinery, probably the most indefensible is the detention system.

This is the vast network of jails and prisons where suspected immigration violators are held while awaiting a hearing and possible deportation. Immigrant detainees are not criminal defendants or convicts serving sentences. They are locked up merely because the government wants to make sure they show up in immigration court.

Detention is intended to help enforce the law, but, in practice, the system breeds cruelty and harm, and squanders taxpayer money. It denies its victims due process of law, punishing them far beyond the scale of any offense. It shatters families and traumatizes children. As a system of mass incarceration — particularly of women and children fleeing persecution in Central America — it is immoral.

The director of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, or ICE, Sarah Saldaña, on Wednesday announced a set of reforms to the family detention system. Federal officials do this from time to time after advocates and journalists expose — as they have for years — the abuses within detention walls. Ms. Saldaña says she wants the “optimal level of care" for detainees, and so she will create a committee and give lawyers more working space to meet with clients, among other things.

But committees and cubicles won't touch the heart of the problem. It's time to end mass detention, particularly of families. Shut the system down, and replace it with something better.

A powerful case for ending immigration detention, along with an array of alternatives, is made in a new report from the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops and the Center for Migration Studies. It traces how the system has grown immense, from housing 85,000 detainees in 1995 to more than 440,000 in 2013. There are many reasons for this growth, including state and local immigration crackdowns, federal dragnet programs like Secure Communities and the flood of money from Congress to the private prison operators that have profited so fruitfully from immigrant criminalization. The system has gotten more sprawling and scandal-prone, but reforms don't stick. The notorious Hutto family detention center in Texas, where children went to classes in prison scrubs, stopped housing families. But the surge of families at the border seeking refuge last year created a political crisis and led the department to resurrect family detention, with new centers with thousands of prison beds for mothers and children.

The report points out that the detention system has become an enormous funnel for the crushingly overburdened, underfunded immigration courts, which receive a meager $300 million from Congress each year, one-sixtieth of what ICE and Customs and Border Protection get. By the end of March, nearly 442,000 cases were pending before immigration judges, with an average case waiting 599 days to be heard, and delays in some courts of more than two years. This is not efficiency or due process.

Ending mass detention would not mean allowing unauthorized immigrants to disappear. Supervised or conditional release, ankle bracelets and other monitoring technologies, plus community-based support with intensive case management, can work together to make the system more humane. But neither Congress nor the Homeland Security Department has embraced these approaches, which would be far cheaper than locking people up.

No one can expect such reforms soon from Congress, which by law requires the Department of Homeland Security to maintain, at all times, 34,000 detention beds, no matter the need. But the problem has to be acknowledged: the inhumanity and wasted expense of imprisoning people who could be working and providing for their families. The American immigration system should reflect our values. The detention system does not do that.

O'Malley Tells Friends He's Leaning Toward Running for President // WSJ // Laura Meckler – May 14, 2015

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley told close friends and supporters Thursday night that he is inclined to run for president, spreading the news in a series of calls Thursday night, according to someone on one of the calls.

He also told them that he would be making an announcement about his plans on May 30 in Baltimore. An aide said the same earlier Thursday.

His calls Thursday included former staff as well as close friends and supporters.

"He said that he is inclined to run for president, and that if he does, needs the support of all his longtime friends and supporters," according to the person on the call.

This person said he also highlighted "great challenges" facing the nation, particularly economic challenges, and said he would bring "new leadership, progressive values and [a] record of getting results."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. O'Malley has certainly been acting like a candidate. He was in the early voting state of New Hampshire on Wednesday meeting shaking hands at a diner, touring a business incubator, raising money for local Democrats and meeting with supporters at a house party.

He would face an uphill challenge. The clear frontrunner for the Democratic nomination is former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. Mr. O'Malley registers far behind her in the polls. He has tried to distinguish himself as an accomplished leader who would bring a "new perspective" he says voters want in Washington.

Hillary Clinton's got Beyonce. And that's important. // WaPo // Hunter Schwarz - May 14, 2015

Hillary Clinton hasn't always had the best relationship with Hollywood and celebrities; in 2008, many of them backed Obama. But more and more, they're lining up behind her for 2016.

Among the attendees at star-studded fundraising events for her in Manhattan on Wednesday, according to Bloomberg: Beyonce, Sharon Osbourne, Meghan Trainor, and fundraiser co-host L.A. Reid. There were also a lot of other people who are wealthy but whose names you don't read in People magazine.

Reid tweeted a photo of himself speaking next to Clinton.

And a Beyonce fan account tweeted a photo it said was of the singer at the fundraiser.

Wednesday's events follow a trickle of other Hollywood supporters who've come out for Clinton. A handful of celebrities voiced their support for her when she announced her candidacy, Mary-Kate and Ashley attended an April fundraiser, and some big-name Hollywood decision makers who were for Obama in 2008 have committed to her already.

There will eventually be more -- it's only May 2015 -- but there's no getting around the fact that there's less enthusiasm for her than there was for Obama. As one anonymous donor told Politico: "[T]here is such a lack of enthusiasm for Hillary, it's really kind of stunning." But Clinton might not need to be too concerned. She's leading in the polls over any potential Democratic threats by a wide margin, and although Hollywood might not be that stoked for her, they're starting to show up.

Reid summed it up in his tweet: "No need to be idealistic when you already know what works."

Entertainment industry Democrats might be lukewarm to Clinton now, but when it comes down to it, they'd rather have her over any of the possible Republican candidates. And until anyone looks like they can actually beat Clinton for the Democratic nomination -- someone like O'Malley -- the money and support will likely flow to the frontrunner.

If nothing else, the key for Clinton is making sure Hollywood doesn't get behind someone else -- building his or her profile and campaign coffers. In that sense, getting Beyonce is a pretty important step.

Hillary's Got A Friend: James Taylor Backs Clinton For President // The Daily Caller // Kaitlan Collins – May 14, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In an interview Thursday, James Taylor said he thinks Hillary Clinton is the “public servant” who can bring the country together, and that he’s backing her for president.

“Aside from the fact that she’s a woman running, she’s the right person,” the 67-year-old said. “The whole point — black or white, male or female, gay or straight, Christian, Jewish, Muslim, atheist — it doesn’t matter what these other connections are.”

He also said that Obama is his “favorite, favorite” president, and said he had “a tough time” during the Bush-Cheney administration.

“I had a hard time accepting that that administration represented me because I don’t think they did,” Taylor said. “I’ve been watching politics since Eisenhower and Adlai Stevenson, when dinosaurs roamed the Earth, and Obama is my favorite, favorite president.”

“I am just thankful for every day that he’s in office. I am so proud that he represents my country and I think he represents me — I think he represents the America that I know.”

Taylor performed at the Democratic National Convention in 2012, and also sang “America the Beautiful” at Obama’s second inauguration.

Time for candidate Clinton to step up on trade // WaPo // David Ignatius – May 14, 2015

President Obama, so often cool and cautious in his language, gave a full-throated roar on trade last week, saying thatSen. Elizabeth Warren was “ absolutely wrong ” in her criticism of the Trans-Pacific Partnership and that “her arguments don’t stand the test of fact and scrutiny .”

I think Obama is right about the TPP, but there’s a larger point here about leadership. Governing is a contact sport. Presidents don’t accomplish great deeds without fighting for them. Often, that includes confronting rebellious members of their own party. And Obama’s tough stance seemed to have succeeded Thursday, as the Senate overcame a Democratic revolt and passed key bills to enable the TPP.

Modern presidents, from Lyndon Johnson to Ronald Reagan to Bill Clinton, have won big legislative victories when they similarly played political hardball. That’s something Obama has learned late in his presidency, but this toughness is visible now on issues that matter to his legacy, such as the Iran nuclear deal, Cuba and free trade. He’s ready to roll opponents, even if they’re his friends.

Which raises a question: What does Hillary Clinton believe about the Trans-Pacific Partnership or the Iran nuclear deal? You would assume that she’s supportive because she helped get both agreements started. But she has been a study in reticence — a trimmer checking the political winds, rather than a leader.

Clinton had it right in her memoir, “Hard Choices,” published last year: “The TPP won’t be perfect . . . but its higher standards, if implemented and enforced, should benefit American businesses and workers.” Is Clinton really running so scared from Warren that she’s ready to disown economic policies she helped shape? Does she think that running against Obama’s economic record will be good politics?

Clinton should put away the waffle iron when it comes to the Iran deal, too. As secretary of state, she launched the secret channel in Oman that passed the message that Iran could enrich uranium if it agreed to tight controls on its nuclear program. Her experience with such secret diplomacy is one reason she’s a compelling candidate. But she has been stinting in her comments so far about the Iran pact.

The progressive rebellion against Obama on the TPP is mystifying, not least because the factual basis for challenging the deal seems so thin. Labor is arguing that the agreement will be a job-sucking repeat of the North American Free Trade Agreement. But the TPP would actually fix many of the weak labor and environmental provisions of NAFTA, imposing tougher standards for Canada and Mexico as well as the other signatories of the 12-nation agreement.

A recent study by Jay Chittooran for Third Way, a centrist think tank, noted that the TPP, like the 17 other U.S. trade deals negotiated since NAFTA, includes “wide-ranging, and enforceable labor protections.” An alternative future, in which the TPP fails and China writes the rules for its Asian trading partners, would effectively mean “non-existent or watered down labor standards,” he wrote.

Warren’s stance, too, is puzzling. She has focused on the TPP’s use of an arcane mediation provision known as Investor-State Dispute Settlement, or ISDS. Though it has been part of investment agreements for decades, Warren claims ISDS gives “a special break to giant corporations.” But a recent study by Gary Clyde Hufbauer for the Peterson Institute for International Economics noted that firms have won only 29 percent of arbitrations under a system similar to ISDS that the World Bank has used since 1996.

But it’s Clinton’s rope-a-dope approach to the TPP that deserves most attention, because it highlights her vulnerability as a candidate. Her caution conveys the sense that she’s running because she wants to get elected, rather than as the exponent of a set of beliefs. Critics have argued that Clinton, similarly, sought to play by a special set of rules in her use of a private e-mail server while she was secretary of state and in the Clinton Foundation’s harvest of contributions from foreigners.

“I’ve run my last election,” Obama said a week ago. “The only reason I do something is because I think it’s good for American workers and the American people and the American economy.”

Clinton is still running, but she could take a political lesson from Obama. She needs to be a fighter. Avoiding the issues will only reinforce the sense that she is a hollow candidate. She should be taking credit for the good provisions in the TPP, not hedging her bets. She may be ready to run, but is she ready to lead?

George Stephanopoulos Gave to the Clinton Foundation. So What? // NY Mag // Jonathan Chait - May 14, 2015

ABC News anchor George Stephanopoulos disclosed today that he has donated $50,000* to the Clinton Foundation. Everybody agrees this is terrible. Stephanopoulos has apologized and ABC has accepted his apology. Republicans believe his gestures of abjection have not gone far enough. Rand Paul proposes that Stephanopoulos recuse himself from moderating the 2016 presidential debates. Senator Mike Lee, through his spokesman, demands that he recuse himself from all 2016 coverage. Clinton Cash” author Peter Schweizer calls it a “massive ethical breach.”

But … why? Paul accuses Stephanopoulos of harboring a “conflict of interest.” But donating money to a charitable foundation is not an interest. His money is gone regardless of what happens to Clinton’s presidential campaign. It’s true that some donors have an incentive to use the Foundation to get close to the Clintons in a way that might benefit their business interests. And yes, as I’ve argued, the Clintons have handled those conflict-of-interest problems really poorly. But none of those problems reflects poorly on Stephanopoulos. The mere fact that a donation might come with an ulterior motive does not taint all donations. If Stephanopoulos needed some angle to get in the room with the Clintons, donating to their foundation would not be the way to do it.

In the absence of a material conflict, is there some symbolic conflict? It is hard to imagine what. The Clinton Foundation has taken on nefarious connotations owing to conflict-of-interest problems that don’t implicate Stephanopoulos. But it is, after all, a charity. It used to have non-partisan overtones.In the heat of the 2012 election, Mitt Romney spoke at the Clinton Global Initiative. News Corporation Foundation and Donald Trump, for goodness sake, donated to it.

Stephanopoulos's defense — that he just wanted to donate to the Foundation's work on AIDS prevention and deforestation — seems 100 percent persuasive. He is the victim of the ethical taint of the Clintons' poorly handled business dealings, combined with an underlying right-wing suspicion of the liberal media, but what his critics have yet to produce is a coherent case against him.

Stephanopoulos' Clinton Donations Not the 'Scandal' Everyone Wants It to Be // Mediatite // Matt Wilstein - May 14, 2015

It's 2015 and suddenly everyone is shocked that ABC News' Chief Anchor George Stephanopoulos has a unique relationship with the Clintons. Hours after news broke that Stephanopoulos, who spent four years in the Bill Clinton White House as a senior adviser, made a $50,000 $75,000 donation to the Clinton Foundation over the course of the past three years, conservatives are already calling for him to be suspended — if not outright fired from his dual roles as host of Good Morning America and This Week. But how bad is Stephanopoulos' supposed offense really?

Bad enough that Stephanopoulos decided to publicly apologize for failing to disclose the donations, especially given his aggressive interview with Clinton Cash author Peter Schweitzer last month, in a statement that has been appended to relevant ABC News stories online:

I made charitable donations to the Foundation in support of the work they're doing on global AIDS prevention and deforestation, a cause I care about deeply. I thought that my contributions were all a matter of public record. However, in hindsight, I should have taken the extra step of personally disclosing my donations to my employer and to the viewers on air during the recent news stories about the Foundation. I apologize.

He then told Politico that "in retrospect" he "probably shouldn't have" made the donations at all and said he would recuse himself from moderating ABC News' 2016 GOP debate.

But not bad enough that ABC News is not firmly standing behind him with a supportive statement of its own:

As George has said, he made charitable donations to the Foundation to support a cause he cares about deeply and believed his contributions were a matter of public record. He should have taken the extra step to notify us and our viewers during the recent news reports about the Foundation. He's admitted to an honest mistake and apologized for that omission. We stand behind him.

For many conservative politicians and commentators, along with a handful of left-leaning media critics, the "honest mistake" excuse is not enough. Senator Mike Lee (R-UT) has indicated that he is no longer interested in engaging with Stephanopoulos in any way. Sites like Breitbart and The Daily Caller are predictably jumping all over the story in an attempt to "expose" Stephanopoulos' pro-Clinton bias once and for all. And even the Washington Post's Erik Wemple has declared that Stephanopoulos no longer has the "bona fides" to cover the Clintons at all.

Some, like Mediaite's Joe Concha, are pointing to Keith Olbermann's 2010 suspension from MSNBC for making far smaller donations to Democratic congressional campaigns as precedent for punishment in this case. But there is a big difference between political donations and charitable ones, even if the charity in question as the name Clinton attached to it.

It seems abundantly clear that had Stephanopoulos been donating to Hillary Clinton's campaign while serving as

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ABC's chief anchor, that would have been highly inappropriate. But, as various commentators from all side of the political spectrum have been asking this morning, what is so wrong with giving money to an organization that does an immense amount of good around the world in areas like climate change and global health?

Yes, as Stephanopoulos readily admitted, he made a mistake by not disclosing the donations. But, despite the anchor's newfound regrets, everyone should be able to agree that it was that lack of overt transparency — and not the donations themselves — that constituted the mistake. Now that everything is out in the open, it should not prevent him from doing his job, which includes providing coverage of Hillary Clinton and the 2016 presidential race.

Ultimately, Stephanopoulos' donations are not a "scandal" in the same way the entire premise of Schweitzer's Clinton Cash is not a "scandal." One can argue that certain people have given money to the Clinton Foundation with the expectation that they will receive something of political value from the Clintons in return. And, in fact, Stephanopoulos himself argued that is something "you have to be careful of" in an interview with Jon Stewart last month. But there has been no evidence to prove that is true, as, ironically, Stephanopoulos got Schweitzer to admit on air.

Similarly, you can expect to hear a lot of arguments from conservatives that because Stephanopoulos gave money to the Clinton Foundation, he cannot possibly be an impartial figure in the 2016 race. Sen. Rand Paul (R-KY), for instance, was the first to say he doesn't want the ABC anchor moderating any GOP debates. But frankly, because of his existing history with the Clintons, wouldn't you expect him and others to say that anyway? There is no reason why giving money to help the global effort to fight AIDS should change anything now.

By the way, you know who else donated at least $500,000 to the Clinton Foundation in recent years? The News Corporation Foundation. And if you think Fox News is going to start disclosing that fact on a regular basis (as Howard Kurtz did earlier this year), let alone stop reporting about Hillary Clinton, don't hold your breath.

Hillary Rodham Clinton Ups the Super PAC Ante // NYT // Francis Clines – May 14, 2015

For all the candidates' grand promises, it turns out the most creative area of the presidential contest so far has been the strategic rush to shift costly campaign duties from budget-tight headquarters to an armada of new super PACs. These groups are free to raise unlimited funds from big-check writers shopping for influence while supposedly operating independent of their candidates. It sounds like a neat trick, and legions of campaign lawyers are working on pulling it off.

Jeb Bush, the Republican frontrunner in sheer money raising, signaled the mushrooming role of the super PAC last month when his strategists indicated they were ready to shift key campaign functions from the central headquarters, where donations are tighter, to their "independent" Right to Rise super PAC for which Mr. Bush has already been raising tens of millions of dollars.

Not to be outspent, the campaign of Hillary Rodham Clinton made clear last week that she would end her arms-length remove from her "independent" super PAC, Priorities USA Action, and personally court affluent donors at its V.I.P. fund raisers where political clout is the commodity. Clinton campaigners appeared to raise the stakes even higher this week by announcing they would be working closely with a new super PAC created from their existing rapid-response political defense operation, Correct the Record.

The attraction for all these chess moves is the huge amounts of money that super PACs can raise, courtesy of court decisions equating unlimited corporate and union political money with free speech. Traditional campaigns are still limited to $2,700 per donor in the primaries plus another $2,700 in the general election. But super PACs are cornucopias whose supposed independence from their candidates seems an increasing fiction with each new gambit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Independent campaign watchdog organizations make a strong case that super PACs are violating the law outright by having candidates' close aides run coordinated operations. Partisan lawyers expert in election law — a major boutique industry in Washington — are on call to justify their latest twists or attack those of their rivals. In the case of the new Clinton political defense super PAC, for example, Clintonites say they will stay within existing law that exempts from regulation any message content posted for free on the Internet, as opposed to paid political ads which the super PAC says it will avoid. Even so, critics instantly questioned whether super PAC staffers will be working for nothing. If they are paid, they could violate the Internet exemption.

Any chance of settling such arcane issues and enforcing clear super PAC rules in behalf of the voters diminishes with each new 7-figure donation. The Federal Election Commission, the supposed referee of the campaign, has become dysfunctional, making it easier for super PACs to move ever more dominantly into the race.

New Neighbor Hillary Clinton Shops and Dines in Brooklyn Heights // BK Heights Blog // Claude Scales – May 14,2015

Presidential aspirant Hillary Clinton (center, in green) visited the Brooklyn Women's Exchange today, and posed for this photo with, left to right: volunteers Lisa, Vanessa and Cindy and manager Elizabeth. Another volunteer, Kristin, gave her a tour of the shop, and said, "She loved our shop and what we do here. She used the term 'it takes a village' to describe some of what we do."

According to Politico Hillary bought a romper and a book, Simpson's Sheep Won't Go To Sleep, for her granddaughter, Charlotte, at the Exchange. She bought another romper at Area Kids on Montague Street, and had a salad for lunch at MontyQ's.

McCain Still Waiting for His Turn at Good Luck (Washington Post 7/24/08)
By Michael D. Shear; A06
It seemed like a great way to counter Obamamania. Sen. John McCain would board a helicopter in New Orleans today, skim quickly over the Gulf of Mexico and land on an oil rig -- a made-for-TV moment to highlight his call for offshore drilling, an issue that Republicans believe will be a big winner in November. Then came Hurricane Dolly, a Category 2 storm that made a helicopter ride impossible. And then, improbably, a 600-foot oil tanker collided with a barge on the Mississippi River, creating a 12-mile oil slick and causing diesel fumes to waft over the city's French Quarter. The trip was off.

McCain and the Safety of Offshore Drilling (Washington Post blog 7/24/08)

...In an energy speech recently, McCain said that: "As for offshore drilling, it's safe enough these days that not even Hurricanes Katrina and Rita could cause significant spillage from the battered rigs off the coasts of New Orleans and Houston." In fact, Katrina and Hurricane Rita caused damage to oil rigs and storage facilities in the Gulf, according to press reports and government studies.

McCain Offers His Own Definition of 'Surge' (WSJ blog 7/23/08)
Elizabeth Holmes
John McCain continued to assert his position on the troop surge in Iraq Wednesday despite calls for him to retract the statement. While talking with reporters at a grocery story in Bethlehem, Penn., McCain was asked to clarify his earlier remarks that the Anbar Awakening was a result of the increase in troop levels. Critics say the alliance happened well before the so-called surge was implemented. McCain began his answer with his definition of "surge" and then shared his own experience while visiting Iraq. "A surge is really a counter-insurgency strategy. And it's made up of a number of components," McCain said.

Barack Obama has a large, nearly 2 to 1 lead over John McCain among Jewish voters, according to the latest Gallup data. Obama's 60 to 33 percent advantage in polls conducted before his high-profile overseas trip is close to the average split among Jewish voters in exit polls going back to 1972 (65 to 32 percent), but if McCain gets a third of these voters on Election Day, he will do better than any GOP candidate has since 1988.

Talking to Iran Is Not So Controversial

Don't look now but there is a broad consensus on what the next administration should do about Iran.

Ilan Goldenberg | June 25, 2008 | web only

If two years ago you were to tell me that the Democratic presidential nominee would make engaging with Iran a central element of his campaign, I would have thought you were joking. After all, talking to a country which has historically enjoyed a favorability rating of a whopping 10 percent in the United States and has a president known for his anti-western rhetoric probably isn't going to be all that popular. Not to mention the fact that the most substantive interaction Americans have had with Iran over the last thirty years involved watching blindfolded hostages and burning American flags on their television screens.

Yet incredibly, in a feat that defies conventional wisdom, Barack Obama is more than just holding his own against John McCain. When it comes to Iran he has the American public and most foreign policy experts squarely behind him.

Obama's position is that we should be willing to engage in direct talks with the Iranian regime and offer them a choice: greater economic incentives and regular diplomatic relations in exchange for greater cooperation or economic sanctions and political isolation for their intransience. John McCain and President Bush both argue that the United States should only talk to Iran if it first agrees to the precondition of suspending its uranium enrichment program. Essentially, they are demanding that Iran give up its most significant bargaining chip before even sitting down at the table. In the meantime McCain has called for more robust sanctions and has continued the Bush administration's pattern of saber rattling – even jokingly singing about 'bomb, bomb, bombing' Iran.

Americans support the idea of dealing directly with the Iranian regime. A recent Gallup poll found that despite extremely low opinions of Iran, 59 percent believe it's a good idea for the president to meet with the Iranian leadership. A Public Agenda/Foreign Affairs poll taken this spring found that 47 percent of Americans believed that establishing better relations with Iran through diplomacy was the one best way for the United States. to deal with Iran, while 40 percent supported economic sanctions, military threats or military action. This represented a 21 point swing from the fall of 2007 when only 35 percent supported diplomatic talks as the best option and 49 percent argued for more aggressive policies.

Meanwhile, experts and former government officials from across the political spectrum are also coming to the conclusion that direct talks must be part of a comprehensive strategy. The bipartisan Iraq Study Group Report that included former Republican Secretaries of State James Baker and Laurence Eagleburger argued in December 2006 that the United States should engage Iran on the question of Iraq. Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, Admiral Mullen, recently stated that he "would like to have a healthy dialogue with Iran." At a recent conference hosted by the centrist Center for New American Security (CNAS), Jim Dobbins, who worked with the Iranians when he was leading U.S. negotiating efforts after the war in Afghanistan, Dennis Ross, who served as special envoy to the Middle East during the Clinton Administration, and Suzanne Maloney, who was on the State Department's policy planning staff working Iran issues from 2005-2007, all agreed that direct talks should be an important component of U.S. strategy.

This consensus further reinforces a new CNAS report arguing that the Bush administration's continued emphasis on using military threats as leverage is actually making any diplomatic breakthrough less likely. Richard Haas, who has served in a number of Republican administrations and is currently the president of the Council on Foreign Relations, also supports direct talks and even a neoconservative like Robert Kagan, a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, has argued that talks are a good idea (Although admittedly he believes that they will likely fail, and that the outcome will be greater international support for harsher measures against the Iranian regime).

A number of factors account for the growing consensus on Iran. First, the Iraq War has dramatically changed the country's views on the use of force. Polling over the past few years has shown a reduction in the number of Americans who see military force as the most effective tool for keeping America safe and a related increase in support for diplomacy. Before the invasion the public was led to believe that that the war would be quick, easy and cheap. But with more than 4,100 American casualties, approximately 30,000 wounded, hundreds of thousands of Iraqis dead, and direct costs alone topping $500 billion Americans have been reminded that war is hard, expensive, and unpredictable, and that the use of military force should only be seen as a last resort.

In addition to Iraq, the absolute failure of our Iran policy has also caused people to reconsider. The Bush administration has refused to engage with Iran at a senior level until it suspends its uranium enrichment program. In the meantime Iran has gone from zero to 3,000 nuclear centrifuges. Freed from its two greatest local rivals -- Saddam Hussein and the Taliban -- it has expanded its influence into Iraq, Afghanistan and across the Middle East. The supposedly tough sanctions that would dissuade the Iranian government have failed to materialize since the Russians and Chinese have offered little support for the types of economic measures that would inflict genuine pain on the Iranian regime. And there is general agreement that bombing Iran's nuclear facilities would only cause a temporary delay in its uranium enrichment program, while guaranteeing that the regime would react by moving beyond its current civilian nuclear program and develop a bomb.

Given these bad options, the choice is no longer between engaging in direct diplomacy or trying to pressure Iran through military and economic coercion to give up its nuclear program. We must now decide between allowing Iran to continue to work against American interests, move closer towards becoming a nuclear power and increase its influence across the region, or to try to engage. Engaging in direct talks does not mean giving in to Iranian demands. But through engagement we can make our own positions clear to the Iranians and work with them on common interests. This policy of talking directly in combination with economic inducements and threats may convince the Iranian regime to bring its nuclear program under an international verification regime with the goal of it eventually being eliminated. In essence the choice has become doing nothing or trying something.

Finally, there is the question of leadership, and here Barack Obama deserves much credit for moving the conversation. When Obama first made the statement last year about direct talks with Iran it was seen as a gaffe to be taken advantage of by his Democratic rivals. But his position actually turned into an advantage in the Democratic Primary. Now Obama is sticking to his guns against McCain and so far it seems to be working. It's hard to imagine that the 21 point swing on this issue over the past few months is not at least partially due to the fact that the man who may currently have the most powerful bully pulpit in the country is out there aggressively making the case for talks.

Obama's zealous advocacy has undoubtedly had an impact in the beltway as well. Foreign policy experts factor political will into their recommendations and try not to take positions that are completely unachievable. But Obama's position has blown through the assumption that talking directly to Iran is domestically unworkable. It's also signaled to experts in think tanks around Washington that they need to start thinking carefully about exactly how the United States would conduct diplomacy with Iran because it's clear that an Obama administration will likely ask for advice on this particular question.

In the end, we should be careful not to expect too much too soon from diplomatic overtures towards Iran. Thirty years worth of grievances will not be solved overnight and the Iranian regime is still playing a malign role in Iraq, supporting Hezbollah and Hamas and building a uranium enrichment capability.

But let's not fool ourselves into thinking that diplomatic engagement with Iran is some kind of controversial fringe progressive idea. In reality, it is the consensus position. It is John McCain and George Bush's stubborn insistence of continuing a failed policy that is out of touch.

The Clinton Global Initiative will launch their annual meeting this month with an awards ceremony honoring actor Leonardo DiCaprio for his environmental work and featuring comedian Seth Meyers.

The 8th annual Clinton Global Citizen Awards ceremony will take place in New York City on Sept. 21 and feature musical performances from Aloe Blacc, Natalie Merchant and Jason Mraz, the Clinton Global Initiative announced on Wednesday.

It will be a star-studded opening to a conference that Former President Bill Clinton, Hillary Clinton and their daughter Chelsea have built up into a forum for discussing ideas on climate change, education and women's rights.

Republicans have long criticized the Clintons, and Democrats in general, as being too close to Hollywood, but the former first family have never shied from their entertainment industry ties.

"Hollywood, likewise, relies on collaboration to bring creative visions to life and has been an excellent partner to the foundation across a number of our efforts," Chelsea Clinton told The Hollywood Reporter, which exclusively reported details of the awards show on Wednesday.

"My family is grateful that some of the most talented, caring and engaged artists in entertainment will help us shine a light on this year's Clinton Global Citizen Award honorees and their extraordinary commitments and work to strengthen communities around the world," she added.

With Hillary Clinton weighing a 2016 presidential bid, the support of Hollywood could provide her with a fundraising advantage.

President Obama will also be speaking at the annual meeting, placing his relationship with Hillary Clinton under scrutiny. Obama has praised his former secretary of State, but Clinton has, in recent weeks, attempted to distance herself from some of the president's policies.

Other speakers include Mary Barra, the CEO of General Motors, who has had to deal with controversy over deaths linked to a faulty ignition switch in GM cars. Actor Matt Damon, co-founder of water.org , will also be speaking.

DiCaprio is being honored for launching the Leonardo DiCaprio Foundation, an environmental organization.

Former Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, actress Eva Longoria and former American Idol judge Randy Jackson, who will serve as music director, will also attend the opening awards ceremony.

The Hill blog: Briefing Room: "Carney: Clinton 'likely to embrace' Obama foreign policy"

By Justin Sink

September 11, 2014, 11:21 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton is "likely to embrace" President Obama's record on foreign policy as a presidential candidate because she helped create and execute it, former press secretary Jay Carney said Wednesday.

"She was secretary of state for President Obama for four years and she understands that record will be part of what she runs on," Carney, hired Wednesday as a contributor to CNN, told the network. "Her time as secretary of state is something she should be proud of, and the president's record on foreign policy is something she is more likely to embrace than anything because she was a big part of it."

Earlier this summer, Clinton suggested in an interview with the Atlantic that Obama's restrained approach to the civil war in Syria had created a vacuum that enabled the rise the Islamic State terror group.

She also criticized the president's frequently cited foreign policy mantra of "don't do stupid stuff," saying the motto was not "an organizing principle" worthy of "great nations."

Although a spokesman for the former New York senator said the comments were not intended as an attack, and Clinton said subsequently she was proud to have served with Obama, those close to the favorite for the 2016 Democratic nomination sought again this week to draw a distinction between their foreign policy leadership style.

"You never want to be a Monday morning quarterback on these issues because who knows how things would ultimately turn out, but Obama has been passive on these issues," one former Clinton aide told The Hill. "She would have taken a more aggressive approach."

Carney told CNN that Clinton "will figure out if she decides to run" how to balance embracing and distancing herself from the president.

The former White House spokesman described Obama as "certainly close to former Secretary Clinton and to President Clinton."

Weekly Standard blog: The Blog: "Bernie Sanders Challenges Hillary"

By Geoffrey Norman

September 11, 2014, 12:22 p.m. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Bernard Sanders of Vermont has been making coy about running for President. He will be visiting Iowa this weekend and yesterday, as CNN reports, he established some distance between himself and Hillary Clinton, the nominee in waiting.

"'If we do not get our act together to come up with public policy which expands the middle class, if we don't overturn Citizens United, if we don't move to public funding of elections, we are going to live in an oligarchic form of society,' Sanders said. 'Now is Hillary Clinton going to say that?'"

Mrs. Clinton has the money, the name recognition, the support of the media, and everything, it seems, except a willingness or ability to say or write (even with the help of ghost writers) anything interesting or original. If she runs – and she has promised to let us know by the end of the year – then it will be a long and unedifying campaign.

Mrs. Clinton can be challenged from within her own party. And should be. The Sanders dare points up her vulnerability on the matters of income inequality, her friendly relations with Wall Street, and her personal status and style as a member of the one-percent and the elite of the political class. And, then, there is her record as secretary of state in an administration whose foreign policy is in tatters. She has already attempted to put some daylight between herself and the president but there is only so much she can accomplish in this regard without alienating people she will need.

It would be good for Mrs. Clinton, and the nation, if she should be pushed into actually working for the nomination, rather than having it bestowed upon her like a crown.

Associated Press: "Democratic National Committee visits Phoenix"

By Terry Tang

September 10, 2014

Friction between the Obama administration and Arizona Republican lawmakers won't influence whether Phoenix gets picked as the site of the party's 2016 national convention, a top Democratic National Committee official said Wednesday.

"The DNC's been to red states, blue states. We're just looking for a city that can accommodate the requirements of a convention," DNC Chief Executive Officer Amy Dacey said during a news conference alongside Phoenix Mayor Greg Stanton.

Stanton said Phoenix has grown more diverse and reflective of the rest of the country, citing its growing Latino population.

"Pretty soon, we'll be hearing around the country that 'So goes Arizona, so goes our nation,'" Stanton said.

He also credited Gov. Jan Brewer, who famously shook her finger at President Barack Obama during a visit to Phoenix, for writing a letter in support of the city's bid to host the convention.

Besides the voter landscape, Stanton touted expansions Phoenix has made in the last decade with its light rail transit system and a sky train connecting the rail to the airport.

Phoenix is the final city that the committee is visiting and is one of five finalists to host the event. Hosting duties would mean a huge boost to the local economy. The 2008 Democratic National Convention brought in more than $260 million to Denver, Stanton said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The other cities being considered are New York, Philadelphia, Birmingham, Alabama, and Columbus, Ohio.

The 15-member DNC group will be in Phoenix until Thursday and will look at the US Airways Center, Chase Field and the Phoenix Convention Center — all in the downtown area.

They also will meet with members of the Phoenix 2016 Host Committee, city staff and business leaders as well as nonprofit and labor leaders to discuss the bid.

Bill Clinton was the last Democrat to carry Arizona in a presidential election in 1996 but before that, Democrats had lost every presidential race in that state since Harry Truman in 1948.

Joe Uscinski, a political science professor at the University of Miami, has studied how national party convention locations have affected presidential political campaigns back to 2000. Uscinski said he doubts choosing Phoenix will drastically push Arizona to be a bluer or even purple state.

"I don't' see them getting a bunch of Republicans in Arizona getting swayed by the Democratic Party," Uscinski said. "All these people who supported SB1070 or all the Jan Brewer legislation, I don't see them being like 'The Democrats are here. I'm going to vote for whomever — Hillary Clinton or something.'"

DNC Chair Debbie Wasserman Schultz is expected to announce the host city later this year or in early 2015.

Republicans have chosen Cleveland as the site for their 2016 national convention.

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "American politics haven't been the same since Sept. 11, 2001. Here's why."

By Chris Cillizza

September 11, 2014, 12:14 p.m. EDT

Thirteen years ago today, two planes struck the World Trade Center towers. One smashed into the Pentagon. A fourth crashed in Pennsylvania. While it's a cliche to suggest that everything changed that day, it's clear that American politics -- the art (and science) of understanding and channeling public opinion into legislation and leadership -- has been radically altered over the intervening years.

In the immediate aftermath of the attacks, there was a a rally-around-the-flag effect the likes of which hadn't been seen in post World War II America. President George W. Bush, who had struggled to move beyond his narrow and protracted victory over Al Gore in the 2000 election, became a massively popular figure overnight.

That chart above in many ways tracks with how the public dealt with the attacks of Sept. 11. After the initial burst of patriotism came the long reckoning with what it meant that terrorists could reach us in our biggest cities and how, whether and how much the federal government should or could do about it. But, that broader conversation didn't happen immediately.

The 2002 election was dominated by tough talk -- and tough attacks -- about how politicians should react to the emergent terrorist threat. The ad that, for better or worse, typified where we were as a country was this one run by then Rep. Saxby Chambliss (R) against Georgia Sen. Max Cleland (D).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats cried foul, insisting that the ad questioned the patriotism of a man who had lost three limbs while fighting in Vietnam. Chambliss won.

The following presidential election was, again, almost entirely dominated by what happened on Sept. 11, 2001 -- and how to keep it from happening again. Bush's approval ratings were sliding -- largely due to creeping doubts about the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan -- but the message that he had kept the country safe since Sept. 11 was a powerful emotional appeal. This ad, entitled "Safer, Stronger", drove home that message.

Bush won.

By the middle of the last decade, however, the country had begun to examine the costs -- economic and psychic -- of our post-Sept. 11 approach. Suddenly, Bush's appeals to the country's common patriotism began to ring hollow for more and more people, and Democrats began to speak out more forcefully on national security matters -- including their concerns about the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. (Worth noting: The plummet in Bush's approval ratings was due, yes, in part to the lack of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq but moreso due to his handling of Hurricane Katrina, which hit the Gulf Coast in August 2005.)

The 2006 midterms were a pivot point in the debate over what Sept. 11 meant -- and how we should react. The round rejection of Bush and his party signaled the doubts among large swaths of the American public as to whether what had happened earlier in the decade was the right reaction -- or an overreaction -- to the attacks of September 2001. (The rethinking included questions about the Patriot Act, which had been passed in 2001 and reauthorized in the summer of 2005.)

Those doubts coalesced in the candidacy of then Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who had come to national attention when he publicly opposed the war in Iraq -- he described it as a "dumb war" in a speech in 2002. Obama, more so than anyone else in the Democratic or Republican race understood that American sentiment about how the country had reacted to Sept. 11, 2001 had changed in the seven years since the attacks had happened. (Former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani, whose entire presidential campaign was premised on his role helping rebuild after the attacks didn't win a single delegate.) Obama was attacked -- first in the primary by Hillary Clinton in the famous/infamous "3 am" ad then in the general election by John McCain -- as insufficiently experienced or committed to keeping the country safe. It didn't work. He won easily.

Think of those seven years as action and reaction. The country moved strongly in one direction between 2001 and 2004 and then snapped back strongly in the other direction between 2005 and 2008. The last six years have been less predictable than the seven that came before them; fears remain (as evidenced by the strong support for air strikes against ISIL) but they are leavened by serious doubts about the institutions that we once held dear -- from government to the church to the media.

Gallup, which regularly polls how much faith people have in institutions, has found that many have reached -- or approached -- all-time lows in trust of late. Of the 17 institutions Gallup tested back in June, only three -- the military, the police and small business -- win a majority of peoples' trust.

That eroding trust in, well, everything, has become the defining political reality of our time. (It's tied closely to a growing pessimism in the public and a sense that, no, things won't always just keep getting better for future generations.) As we have written previously, that lack of trust -- combined with a lingering-if-back-of-the-mind unease about just how safe we are -- has led to a sense of a country adrift, unmoored from the realities that once governed the country and our lives, but without a new set of principles on which to grab hold.

President Obama addressed that unease in a speech -- oddly enough -- at a fundraiser in Seattle in late July. He said (bolding is mine):

“But whether people see what’s happening in Ukraine, and Russia’s aggression towards its neighbors in the manner in which it’s financing and arming separatists; to what’s happened in Syria -- the devastation that Assad has wrought on his own people; to the failure in Iraq for Sunni and Shia and Kurd to compromise -- although we’re trying to see if we can put together a government that actually can function; to ongoing terrorist threats; to what’s happening in Israel and Gaza -- part of peoples' concern is just the sense that around the world the old order isn’t holding and we’re not quite yet to where we need to be in terms of a new order that’s based on a different set of principles, that’s based on a sense of common humanity, that’s based on economies that work for all people.”

The rise of libertarianism -- and Rand Paul -- is a direct reaction to the rising distrust and doubt about who we can trust and what it really means to be an American in 2014. Paul's push for a complete overhaul of American foreign policy toward one far more skeptical about foreign entanglements has found considerable support from a country deeply skeptical that America can or should play world cop. (Four in ten Americans said in a recent NBC-Wall Street Journal poll that the U.S. should be "less active" in world affairs as compared to 27 percent who said the country should be more active.) That debate will be at the center of not only the 2016 Republican primary -- where several of Paul's rivals have blasted his views -- but also the general election fight against presumed Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton who spent four years as President Obama's top diplomat.

That means that 15 years on from the horrific attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, that day -- and what it meant -- will continue to be at the forefront of the national conversation between politicians and the people they hope to represent. The truth is that politicians, like the rest of us, continue to grapple with how 9/11 changed us -- in ways good and bad. That process is ongoing.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "A Closer Look at Hillary Clinton's Approach to China"

By Michael O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution and co-author of "Strategic Reassurance and Resolve: U.S.-China Relations in the 21st Century."

July 28, 2014, 9:53 a.m. EDT

Lost amid the clamor over Hillary Clinton's book tour are some of her views on China, where–despite challenges from Ukraine to the Middle East–her legacy as secretary of state is arguably the most consequential. Mrs. Clinton was a key part of the "pivot to Asia," a process that arguably began with visits to Beijing and Hanoi in 2010 during which she pushed back against China's assertiveness in the South China Sea. She accelerated the effort with a ForeignPolicy.com article in October 2011, and President Barack Obama traveled to Asia the next month.

Personally, I wish Mrs. Clinton would drop the term "pivot"–as it overstates the shift in U.S. defense and foreign-policy resources that can or should be directed toward the Asia-Pacific region–in favor of "rebalance." But her policy thinking toward China has been clear. And while John Kerry has made trips to Asia since becoming secretary of state, he has not conveyed the sense of focus on the region and its problems and possibilities that Mrs. Clinton developed.

Why haven't her ideas about China drawn more attention? The book's style may be one reason: It's written more as a log of her time in office than a reflection on the major issues of the day. Accordingly, more pages are devoted to U.S. efforts to free the blind dissident lawyer Chen Guangcheng after he took refuge in the U.S. Embassy in Beijing than to the much broader issue of China's rise in strategic terms. Mrs. Clinton's commitment to human rights is an important component of her thinking about China—and part of what makes her so good on China policy matters–but the long account about Mr. Chen also could distract from her larger observations about how to handle Beijing.

And those larger observations are hard-hitting. "In November 2009, President Obama received a noticeably lukewarm reception during his visit to China," she writes. "Many observers wondered whether we were seeing a new phase in the relationship, with an ascendant and assertive China no longer hiding its resources and enhanced military capabilities, moving away from 'hide and bide' and toward 'show and tell.' "

Mrs. Clinton then recounts the history of Chinese military provocations in recent years, including Beijing's harassment of the U.S.S. Impeccable in 2009; its declaration of its claims in the South China Sea as a core interest in early 2010; and its complaints in May 2010 that the U.S. was supposedly seeking to encircle China. During a regional security meeting in July 2010, Mrs. Clinton advocated a multilateral approach to resolving disputes, which prompted the Chinese foreign minister to remind listeners–in bullying fashion–that "China is a big country. Bigger than any other countries here."

There is a firmness in Hillary Clinton's thinking about China that provides a good guide to policy and that is less well articulated by the current Obama team. She makes issues easy to understand. The clarity of her thinking, respect for China and awareness of how assertive it can be—and the stakes for the U.S.–bode well for how she would handle Beijing as president.

Too bad this kind of analysis has been lost in the fuss over peripheral matters with the book's rollout.

Slate blog: Weigel: "Poll: Hillary Clinton Does Better With White Voters Than Any Democrat Since 1976"

By David Weigel

July 28, 2014, 12:23 p.m. EDT

Long ago, before the God of Narratives decided that Hillary Clinton was an out-of-touch elitist, she was seen as a fearsome 2016 contender. As the theory went, she could outpoll Barack Obama with white voters while winning non-white voters. The new CNN poll suggests that this is still mostly true. In a fun, cheeky trial heat, CNN's pollster asked voters who they'd support in a 2012 election do-over: Mitt Romney or Barack Obama? Romney won in a rout, the poor guy:

[POLL]

Next, the pollster asked voters to take sides in a hypothetical and inhumanely boring Clinton v. Romney race. Clinton won easy, 55-42. It doesn't take true genius to figure out where those new Democratic votes came from.

[POLL]

Would you look at that? Obama, who won only 39 percent of the white vote in 2012, is swooning because he's lost even more of it. But Clinton's grabbing 46 percent of the white vote. That's better than Obama did in 2008 (43 percent), better than John Kerry did in 2004 (41 percent), better than Al Gore did in 2000 (42 percent). It's even better than her husband did in 1996 (43 percent), though that result -- like the 1992 result -- is skewed by the presence of Ross Perot. You have to go back to 1976 to find a Democrat who polled better than 46 percent with whites. And when Jimmy Carter narrowly defeated Gerald Ford, the electorate was 89 percent white overall. In 2016, it's likely to be closer to 70 percent white. In 2016, a Democrat who wins only 40 percent of the white vote and holds close to Barack Obama's totals with non-whites can win easily.

Special bonus reason for Democratic gloating: In the theoretical Romney race, Clinton wins 62 percent of voters who make less than $50,000. Yes, even after the scandal of her speaking fees.

Associated Press: "Clinton: U.S. Needs Orderly Process for Border Kids"

By Ken Thomas

July 28, 2014, 1:19 p.m. EDT

Hillary Rodham Clinton says she supports creating a refugee screening process for Central American children in their home countries to discourage dangerous trips to the U.S. and opposes changing a 2008 immigration law under review by Congress.

The potential 2016 Democratic presidential candidate says in an interview with Fusion's Jorge Ramos that Congress should provide more money to help immigration officials determine whether children should be considered migrants or refugees. Some of the children should be sent back, Clinton says, but the U.S. needs a "sensible, orderly process" to care for the tens of thousands of children crossing the border, mostly from El Salvador, Honduras and Guatemala.

"A lot of people are understandably, as I am, upset about what's happened to these kids but if we don't have a procedure, it's not going to stop," Clinton said in the interview airingTuesday.

Clinton's comments were her most extensive on the ongoing border crisis. She said in a CNN forum in June that the children should be reunited with their families but the U.S. needed to make clear that "just because your child gets across the border doesn't mean your child gets to stay."

Congress is seeking ways to reduce the influx of the children this week. Republicans have supported changing a 2008 law so that migrant youths can be sent home more quickly. Clinton cautioned some children would face "terrible danger" if they returned and a better process is needed to screen the children.

The White House is considering a pilot program that would give refugee status to young people from Honduras, which could be expanded to Guatemala and El Salvador. It involves screening youths in their home countries to determine whether they qualify for refugee status.

Mediaite: "Jorge Ramos Asks Hillary Clinton: Do You Have a 'Latino Problem?'"

By Matt Wilstein

July 28, 2014, 12:47 p.m. EDT

In a preview of a longer interview that will air on Fusion's America with Jorge Ramos Tuesday night, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton weighed in on the current debate over undocumented minors flooding over the border from Central America, telling the host that without further action from Congress, "more kids are going come." But first, she addressed her possible "Latino problem."

"Do you think you have a Latino problem?" Jorge Ramos asked Clinton.

"I hope not!" she replied, laughing enthusiastically, before Ramos' deadpan demeanor caused her to turn more serious. "I never have before, so I hope not," she added. "Obviously, we have a lot of problems that we have to address."

Ramos explained that he was asking because Clinton recently said of the Central American children during her CNN town hall interview that we as a country need to "send them back."

"Well, that was sort of a short circuit of what I have said overall," Clinton said, explaining that she was referring more to "migrant children" than "refugee children." While both deserve "as much love" as we can give them, she said there should be separate "procedures" for each group.

Ramos grilled Clinton on her stance, asking her specifically who she would deport. If children don't have a legitimate case for asylum or an existing family connection in the U.S., then Clinton said they "should be returned to their families."

"We send kids back all the time," she said, seemingly admitted that some of those children who are sent back to their home countries could be in danger. "That's why we need a process to determine who falls into [the refugee] category." She argued that the U.S. should help set up a screening process in places like Honduras and Guatemala that determines whether children are in need of asylum before they even make the dangerous journey across the border.

Huffington Post: “Hillary Clinton: 'I Don't Agree' On Changing Trafficking Laws To Address Border Crisis”

By Elise Foley

July 28, 2014, 10:14 a.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said Friday that she opposes changes to a 2008 law meant to help unaccompanied children and teenagers who crossed the border illegally, and instead endorsed the idea of screening minors in their native countries before they make a dangerous trek to the U.S.

"We should be setting up a system in Honduras, Guatemala, El Salvador to screen kids. Before they get in the hands of coyotes, or they get on the 'Beast,' or they're raped. Terrible things happen to them," she told Fusion's Jorge Ramos, referring to the "Beast," a series of freight trains that minors from Central America are riding to get through Mexico to the U.S.

Border patrol agents have apprehended more than 57,500 unaccompanied minors crossing the border illegally since the beginning of October, straining the country's system of caring for, screening and possibly deporting the children and teenagers.

"If we don't have a procedure, it's not going to stop," Clinton said. "More kids are going to come."

She differed from President Barack Obama and many Republicans on whether to change the 2008 trafficking law that keeps unaccompanied minors from countries other than Mexico and Canada from being quickly deported.

While Obama initially said he wanted Congress to change the 2008 law, he did not propose legislative changes in his $3.7 billion funding request earlier this month, angering Republicans who say he flip-flopped on the issue. The administration has, however, continued to back changing the law at a later date.

"I don't agree that we should change the law," Clinton said. "That's why I'm advocating an appropriate procedure, well funded by the Congress, which they are resisting doing, so that we can make individual decisions."

Clinton said the U.S. could instead screen minors in their native countries to determine whether they would be eligible for refugee status or some other type of relief.

Clinton said in June that unaccompanied minors "should be sent back as soon as it can be determined who responsible adults in their families are."

Pressed on that point by Ramos, Clinton stood by her statement that some minors should be deported.

"Some of them should be sent back," she said, adding that those without a legitimate claim for asylum or some type of family connection should be deported and returned to their families.

CNN: "Hillary Clinton defends Obama against conservative barbs"

By Shannon Travis

July 27, 2014, 2:09 p.m. EDT

Washington (CNN) – If you wanted a friend to defend your reputation against serious sideswipes, who better to do it than one of the most recognizable women in the world, with years of experience beating back barbs?

Enter Hillary Clinton in defense of President Barack Obama. As conservatives throw arrows aimed at the President's handling of multiple world crises, Clinton defended her former adversary-turned-boss-turned-friend.

The former secretary of state – and prospective presidential candidate - sat down with CNN's Fareed Zakaria for a wide-ranging interview taped Friday and aired Sunday on "CNN's Fareed Zakaria GPS."

Some conservatives accuse Obama of not being tough enough on Russian President Vladimir Putin. Is the President appropriately handling the Ukranian crisis, Clinton was asked?

"I think that he is facing some of the same challenges that American presidents face when dealing with threats within Europe," Clinton said. "The United States, obviously, has a great interest in helping to maintain peace and security in Europe and we have a formal alliance, NATO, to do so. But much of what we can do and what the President is calling for requires the full participation of our European friends and allies."

Clinton continued: claiming Putin "bears responsibility" for the downing of Malaysia Airlines Flight MH17, calling for more sanctions, urging Europe to "stand up to" Putin despite its reliance on energy from Russia, and stressing the need for Europe and the United States to assist Ukraine.

And she wasn't done offering supportive words for the President.

Later in the hourlong interview, Clinton was asked about one specific criticism.

"Charles Krauthammer, the conservative critic, has said, 'The world is going to hell and President Obama is playing golf,'" Zakaria said. "Is he playing too much golf while all these crises are popping up?"

Clinton was unequivocal.

"No," she said. "I think that's an unfair comment to make."

"I know from my own experience with the President, where we worked so closely together, and as I write in the book, you know, went from being adversaries to partners to friends, that he is constantly working and thinking. But he also wants to do what will make a difference, not just perform. He wants to be sure that we know what the consequences, both intended and unintended, are.

"When it comes to the Middle East, this is always a very difficult issue for any American president," she said.

"I think the President is doing what he can do to try to get a cease-fire and then see whether we can sort out some, you know, longer-term

The Week: Speed Reads: "Hillary Clinton tacks right: praises Bush, criticizes Obama, cozies up to Wall Street"

By Bonnie Kristian

July 28, 2014, 11:50 a.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, an expected contender in the 2016 presidential election, has positioned herself to appeal to more moderate or even neoconservative audiences in recent days. Speaking to CNN on Sunday, she praised President George W. Bush's AIDS relief programs in Sub-Saharan Africa, saying his initiatives there make her "proud to be an American."

In the same interview, Clinton distanced herself from President Obama's foreign policy, suggesting that he has not made it clear how D.C. "intend[s] to lead and manage" international affairs. Clinton advocated a more interventionist approach, arguing that, "We have to go back out and sell ourselves" as guarantors of worldwide stability. Currently, the U.S. military has as many as 900 bases worldwide, and has ground troops or drones active in Afghanistan, Pakistan, Iraq, and Yemen.

Meanwhile, despite objections from supporters within her own party, Clinton has repeatedly spoken to audiences at large Wall Street banks like Goldman Sachs and Ameriprise Financial. "The problem is these speeches give the impression that she's still in the Wall Street wing of the party," said Charles Chamberlain of the left-wing Democracy For America PAC.

If Clinton is elected President in 2016, the White House will have been in the hands of just three families — the Bushes, Clintons, and Obamas — for 32 years by the time her first term is complete.

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "'Holograms' brought back Tupac. Now they want to take Washington."

By Sean Sullivan

July 28, 2014, 11:25 a.m. EDT

Resurrect Tupac for a live performance? Been there. Help elect a prime minister in the world's second most populous country? Done that. Next stop? Washington.

Holographic technology is coming to the nation's capital. The hope is to do for political campaigns, government agencies and trade groups what it's done for the entertainment industry and elected officials overseas in recent years: Increasingly become more necessity and less novelty.

Hologram USA, a company specializing in the technology, will announce Monday that it has hired the Northern Virginia-based firm U.S. Government Relations International. USGRI will try to convince would-be clients that Hologram USA's lifelike three-dimensional images that can be broadcast live across the country are vital communications tools.

"A general or a politician or a head of corporate can project themselves physically in a life-size projection that is completely believable at a matter of a few feet," said Alki David, who heads up Hologram USA.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That's what Narendra Modi did in his winning campaign for prime minster of India this year. Hologram USA helped Modi reach out to the country's hundreds of millions of voters by enabling him to appear live in holographic form via satellite at political rallies. For many of the eager crowds who gathered to hear Modi speak, it was the next best thing to a stump speech in the flesh.

Hologram USA wants to eventually do the same thing for Rand Paul or Hillary Rodham Clinton -- David says he's a fan of both -- or anyone else who runs for office and is looking to improve its voter communication efforts.

David, who comes from a wealthy Greek shipping family, owns the North American license to the patent for technology created by Uwe Maass, an engineer born in Germany. The technology is a modern twist on a 19th century illusion technique called Pepper's Ghost that involves reflecting images off of glass. Maass's version uses foil. (David refers to it as technically not a hologram, but "hologram-like" technology.)

David has partnered with Maass and Giovanni Palma, who belong to a separate company called up Musion Das Hologram.

Jeffrey Taylor, a managing partner at USGRI and former congressional aide, envisions the technology increasing interaction between voters and presidential candidates, who simply can't appear physically in every city, even in crucial swing states.

"Let's take New Hampshire and Clinton," explained Taylor, referencing the early nominating state. She could appear remotely via hologram in areas her schedule prevents her from traveling to, if she runs for president, fielding questions in a kind of virtual town hall meeting, he suggested.

"You would actually have an interactive, three-dimensional image and a monitor in front of her [to field questions] when the lady at a coffee klatsch says, 'What are your views on energy?' " said Taylor.

He added: "The only thing you cant do is shake her hand."

But that's a challenge advocates of the technology will encounter, experts say. Retail politics is a big part of campaigning. Voters want to see candidates in person at the state fair or the local parade. Technology, no matter how advanced, is never going to offer a perfect replacement.

For hologram technology to take a foothold in campaigns, "it has to complement" the human element, said Zac Moffatt, Mitt Romney's 2012 digital director.

Another challenge is competition from other, less expensive social media and communication tools. For example, Clinton recently held a live chat on Facebook and one on Twitter that was streamed live on YouTube.

The question when it comes holographic technology, in Moffatt's view: "Is the impact on the voter or constituent exponentially greater than Skype of Google Hangout or other [voter contact] methodologies?"

David pegs the cost of of a robust national effort in the U.S. at about $6 million a month. That's beyond the budgets of most congressional campaigns and is a sizable investment even for White House hopefuls. But David argues that weighed against the cost of barnstorming the country and advancing and staffing events, it will eventually look like a bargain.

The perpetual desire to build buzz in politics could spur demand for David's company. The Republican and Democratic presidential nominating conventions routinely try to outdo one another with bells and whistles designed to attract earned media attention.

Few technological advances are buzzier now than holograms. The 2012 Coachella music festival featured a performance by a holographic recreation of late rapper Tupac Shakur. It went viral online. This year's Billboard Music brought back Michael Jackson. (The performance triggered competing lawsuits between David and another company over patent rights.)

The increasing desire to micro-target voters in campaigns could also boost the appeal of holographic technology.

"With advancements in artificial intelligence, you could soon have holograms of presidential candidates at your door, interacting with you and asking and answering questions," wrote David Plouffe in a recent Wall Street Journal op-ed. Plouffe managed President Obama's 2008 campaign.

Beyond the campaign trail, David and Taylor see other reasons to bring the technology to Washington. Military simulations and briefings could be improved, they say. It could also enable the White House to communicate with more Americans by bringing the president into a "sixth grade classroom in Missouri," without all the costs of travel and security, for example, said Taylor.

It was technology that brought Taylor and David together. Taylor reached out after seeing David in a TV interview. They connected through LinkedIn, the social networking site.

To David, who says he is already in talks with Democrats and Republicans he declined to name, the technology's best selling point is the awe it in inspires when people experience it for the first time.

"I think that as much as we can write about it and evangelize it and imagine it and see it online, you don't get the impact of what it's really like until you see it," he said.

Financial Times column: Gideon Rachman: "A Clinton in power will not bring back the good times"

By Gideon Rachman

July 28, 2014, 4:23 p.m.

[Subtitle:] Bill Clinton became president at a golden moment for the US

Back in 1992 I was watching from the balcony of Madison Square Garden as Bill Clinton accepted the Democratic party nomination for the presidency. On stage with him was his wife, Hillary, and their young daughter, Chelsea. The music that blared from the loudspeakers as the Clintons took their bow was Fleetwood Mac singing "Don't stop thinking abouttomorrow". It was a quintessentially American message – optimistic and forward-looking.

By contrast, if and when Hillary Clinton bids for the presidency in 2016, her unofficial campaign anthem might as well be "Yesterday". The most powerful appeal of the Clinton name is nostalgia for the good old days of the 1990s, when all America's troubles seemed so far away.

Opinion polls show that Mr Clinton is now easily the most well-regarded president of the past 25 years. Mrs Clinton has her own formidable résumé – as a senator and as secretary of state. But a large part of her appeal still lies in the warm glow of the Clinton brand. As Maureen Dowd of The New York Times, a long-time chronicler of the foibles of the Clintons, pointed out in a recent column, even their bitter enemies seem to be succumbing to nostalgia. Ms Dowd quoted Bill O'Reilly, the conservative television star: "With Hillary you get Bill. And Bill knows what's going on."

But while Mr Clinton may yet return to the White House as First Man, the Clinton years are never coming back. Mr Clinton had his strengths as president – intelligence, shrewdness, empathy – but he was, above all, lucky in his timing. He came to power at a golden moment for the US in both economics and in geopolitics.

The Soviet Union had collapsed in 1991, just a year before Mr Clinton was first elected. Throughout his eight years as president, there was no serious competitor to the US for the role of global superpower. The Japanese, who had haunted the dreams of Americans in the 1980s, entered a prolonged slump at the start of the 1990s, from which they have yet to pull out. China had been knocked sideways by the student uprising of 1989 and its violent suppression. The Chinese economy grew rapidly in the 1990s but it was still only 12 per cent the size of the US economy by the time

The name Osama bin Laden had yet to impinge on the public consciousness. Al-Qaeda struck New York and Washington nine months after Mr Clinton left the Oval office. The foreign-policy preoccupations of the Clinton years presented themselves as moral dilemmas – such as Bosnia or Rwanda – rather than as threats to national security.

Mr Clinton's economic inheritance was similarly golden. The frightening deficits of the Reagan years disappeared in the 1990s, partly because of sensible fiscal decisions taken by President George HW Bush. By the time Mr Clinton took office, the US economy was already recovering strongly. He was the lucky beneficiary of a surge in American productivity, following the transformation of the workplace by computers. With unemployment at just 4 per cent and inflation under control, there was exuberant talk of a "New Economy".

Given this fortunate combination of circumstances, is it any wonder that the president had time for dalliances in the Oval Office?

Now compare Mr Clinton's inheritance, with the America that faced Barack Obama. The collapse of Lehman Brothers, just two months before the 2008 presidential election, meant that Mr Obama and his team took office facing an acute financial and economic crisis – which continues to overshadow his presidency, six years after the event. (Despite that, Mr Obama was able to push through the comprehensive healthcare reform that had eluded Mr Clinton and his wife, who was placed in charge of the first effort to secure universal coverage.)

The international picture that Mr Obama faced was similarly bleak. The "unipolar moment" Mr Clinton enjoyed was already drawing to a close by the time Mr Obama came to power. The US was struggling to extricate itself from draining wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. When Mr Obama leaves office in January 2017, perhaps to give way to President Hillary Clinton, China will – at least measured in terms of purchasing power – already have displaced the US as the world's largest economy. Conservative commentators, such as Mr O'Reilly, often blame these setbacks on Mr Obama's "weakness" or failures of leadership. In truth, he was dealt a much weaker hand than any of his recent predecessors.

The nostalgia for the Clinton years also extends to matters of style. Mr Obama, once praised for his cool, is now condemned for his "coldness". Mr Clinton, once attacked for his ill-discipline, is now lauded for his humanity. It is true that Mr Clinton brought a warmth to the presidency that Mr Obama lacks. On the other hand, Mr Obama has conducted himself with a dignity that eluded Mr Clinton.

As Mrs Clinton prepares to run for the ultimate prize – with the publication of a worthy book and numerous television appearances – she will be hoping that Americans remember the good bits of the Clinton years and forget the icky parts. The real contrast between the Obama and the Clinton presidencies, however, is not between personalities but between eras.

It would be nice to believe that another Clinton in the White House could somehow magically recreate the golden economic and geopolitical circumstances of the 1990s. But, as Fleetwood Mac once put it: "Yesterday's gone, yesterday's gone."

Associated Press: "Analysis: Clinton Impeachment Shadows GOP Lawsuit"

By David Espo

July 28, 2014, 11:43 a.m. EDT

The last time Republicans unleashed impeachment proceedings against a Democratic president, they lost five House seats in an election they seemed primed to win handily.

Memories of Bill Clinton and the campaign of 1998 may help explain why Speaker John Boehner and the current GOP leadership want no part of such talk now, although conservatives increasingly clamor for it. And also why President Barack Obama's White House seems almost eager to stir the impeachment pot three months before midterm elections.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans have already "opened the door for impeachment" with their plans to sue the president over allegedly failing to carry out the health care law, White House aide Dan Pfeiffer told reporters. In something of a dare last week, he also said any further action Obama takes on his own on immigration will "up the likelihood" of a GOP-led move to remove Obama from office.

House Democrats' campaign committee used reports of tea party Republicans meeting to discuss impeachment in an emailed fundraising plea sent Sunday. They warned "the fate of Obama's presidency is at stake."

Pfeiffer and Democratic fundraisers aren't privy to the inner workings of the House Republican leadership. Boehner, who is, insists at every public opportunity that the lawsuit is one thing, impeachment is another - and not on the table. The planned suit results from a dispute over the balance of powers between the president and Congress, he said last month, and the House "must act as an institution to defend the constitutional principles at stake."

Republicans dispute suggestions by Democrats that the suit's true purpose is to release pressure from the party's more extreme supporters for impeachment.

One Republican committee chairman, Rep. Pete Sessions of Texas, said in a brief interview that Clinton deserved to be impeached, but Obama does not.

The 42nd president "broke the law," he said of formal allegations that accused Clinton of lying under oath to a grand jury and obstructing justice in connection with his relationship with White House intern Monica Lewinsky.

Contrasting the former president with the current one, Sessions said: "Breaking the law is different from not fully enforcing the law."

At least one senior Republican isn't as definitive. Interviewed on Sunday on Fox, Louisiana Rep. Steve Scalise, newly elected to the GOP leadership, repeatedly declined to rule out impeaching Obama.

For his part, Sessions spoke a few hours after he opened a meeting of the House Rules Committee with what could well have been a case for impeachment: sweeping allegations that went far beyond the boundaries of the planned lawsuit.

"The president has unilaterally waived work requirements for welfare recipients," the Texas Republican said. The chief executive "ended accountability provisions in No Child Left Behind," an education law dating to the George W. Bush era, he said.

The president "refused to inform the Congress of the transfer of what is known as the Taliban five," Sessions went on. "And ignored the statutory requirements of the Affordable Care Act," he said, using the formal name for the 4-year-old health care law.

However compelling the complaints, no judge will ever rule on most of them.

Three months before the November elections, Republicans intend to limit their lawsuit to a narrower claim, that he has failed to faithfully carry out the health care law that, according to polls, remains poorly received by the public.

"In 2013, the president changed the health care law without a vote of Congress, effectively creating his own law by literally waiving the employer mandate and the penalties for failing to comply with it," Boehner said in a statement last month. "No president should have the power to make laws on his or her own."

Republican officials say they decided to narrow the focus of the court case after being advised by lawyers that their chances of succeeding would be stronger.

None of this seems likely to satisfy the political right, as 2008 vice presidential candidate Sarah Palin recently made clear. "It's time to impeach; and on behalf of America we should vehemently oppose any politician on the left or right who would hesitate in voting for articles of impeachment," she wrote.

Yet her opinion is not widely shared among non-Republicans, and Democrats quickly sought to use calls like the one from Palin to raise campaign funds.

In a CNN survey last week, more than half of all Republicans said they favor Obama's impeachment, but that level that fell to one-third of the overall electorate. Among independents, 63 percent opposed it.

A lawsuit is also generally unpopular, but less so than impeachment would be, the poll indicated.

When it came to the lawsuit, 41 percent of the country backed it. Support was 75 percent among Republicans, while independents opposed it by 43-55.

As a junior member of the leadership in 1998, Boehner had a seat at the table when Republicans decided to inject Clinton's impeachment into that year's elections.

Republicans held their majority, but Democrats gained five seats, a rarity in midterm elections for the party in power in the White House.

Clinton was impeached in a post-election session of the House, later acquitted in the Senate and remained in office. Then-Speaker Newt Gingrich fared worse. Under pressure from his rank and file, the Republican gave up his post and left Congress soon after the election debacle.

In the upheaval, Boehner lost his leadership post for a decade.

THE STORY

The European Union is struggling to deal with a refugee and migrant crisis that's getting worse every day.

PSST...WHAT'S THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN REFUGEES AND MIGRANTS?

Refugees are forced to leave home to escape things like war. Migrants leave home voluntarily to try to make their lives better with a new job or education. Take a brutal civil war in Syria, this thing called ISIS, and weak economies in Africa and you have hundreds of thousands of people rushing to get to the EU.

WHAT'S THE LATEST?

For months, there has been a series of tragedies and chaos associated with people trying to escape to the EU. Leaders have promised they'd figure out a solution. But meanwhile, yesterday, everyone saw photos of a drowned toddler who washed onto a beach in Turkey. He was a Syrian refugee who drowned with 11 others, including his five-year-old brother, trying to get to Greece. And in France this week, migrants and refugees shut down Eurostar trains when they swarmed the track trying to get into Britain. And then in Hungary yesterday, thousands of migrants and refugees were blocked from boarding a train to Germany. And then in Greece yesterday, hundreds of migrants and refugees clashed with police while trying to cross over the border Greece shares with Macedonia. All in a day's escape.

So far, the EU has sorta tried and totally failed to deal with this crisis. Top EU officials say they're announcing a new plan next week. Good idea.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU FIND SOMEONE TO FILL YOUR LABOR DAY WEEKEND RENTAL...

Gang's all here. For months, President Obama has been sweating it out over whether Congress will give the OK to his foreign policy baby — the Iran nuclear deal. He's faced some serious opposition so far, even from within his own party, but has promised to do whatever it takes to seal the deal (read: veto, veto, veto.) Yesterday, a Maryland senator became the 34th lawmaker to cross the Red Rover line to his side. Meaning, there won't be enough lawmakers against the deal to override Obama's inevitable veto. Cue Obama breathing a huge sigh of relief. The GOP-led Congress is still expected to vote against it, but yesterday's news means that doesn't really matter. Refresher: the deal between Iran and six world powers limits Iran's nuclear program in exchange for lifting harsh economic sanctions on the country. Some – including the GOP and Israel – say the deal is too soft on Iran. Others – Obama and many Dems – say the deal will help ward off another war in the Mideast. Up next: an official vote later this month. Yayyyy politics.

Time for something new? Yesterday, reports came out that DreamWorks and Disney aren't renewing their distribution dea when it expires next summer. Under the deal, DreamWorks has been working with Disney to distribute its films, aka get them into theaters and later onto TV channels. But Dreamworks has not turned out to be a dream for Disney — it produced less films and less profits than expected. Plus, Disney also bought shiny brands like Marvel and Lucasfilm. So it looks like Disney isn't too excited about keeping up the relationship. Steven Spielberg – co-founder of DreamWorks and dinosaur aficionado – is now reportedly flirting with Universal. Walter Reich, Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Professor of International Affairs, Ethics, and Human Behavior (George Washington University, moderator)

The world was stunned when Vladimir Putin invaded and seized Crimea in March 2014. In the weeks that followed, pro-Russian rebels staged uprisings in southeastern Ukraine. The United States and its Western allies immediately imposed strict sanctions on Russia and whenever possible tried to isolate it diplomatically. This sharp deterioration in East-West relations has raised basic questions about Putin's provocative policies and the future of Russia and Ukraine. Marvin Kalb, who wrote commentaries for Edward R. Murrow before becoming CBS News' Moscow bureau chief in the early 1960's, and who also served as a translator and junior press officer at the US Embassy in Moscow, argues that, contrary to conventional wisdom, Putin did not "suddenly" decide to invade Crimea. He had been waiting for the right moment ever since disgruntled Ukrainians rose in revolt against his pro-Russian regime in Kiev's Maidan Square. These demonstrations led Putin to conclude that Ukraine's opposition constituted an existential threat to Russia. Imperial Gamble examines how Putin reached that conclusion by taking a critical look at the recent political history of post-Soviet Russia. It also journeys deep into Russian and Ukrainian history to explain what keeps them together and yet at the same time drives them apart.

Marvin Kalb is a nonresident senior fellow with the Foreign Policy program at Brookings, a senior adviser at the Pulitzer Center on Crisis Reporting, and a Murrow Professor Emeritus at Harvard. In his long and distinguished career, he served as the chief diplomatic correspondent for CBS and NBC, the Moscow bureau chief and the host of Meet the Press. He focuses on the impact of media on public policy and politics, and is also an expert in national security, with a focus on U.S. relations with Russia, Europe and the Middle East. His most recent book is The Road to War: Presidential Commitments Honored and Betrayed (Brookings Institution Press, 2013).

Palin Energy Speech: Light, Sour and Crude

Politics Trumps Policy as Palin Changes Tune from Earlier Praise of Obama Energy Plan

Washington, DC — Republican Vice Presidential candidate, Governor Sarah Palin's speech on energy today was riddled with distortions and stands in stark contrast to her reaction to the Obama's energy plan before she became the GOP nominee.

"While the solar energy company was a nice backdrop, Palin's speech, like the McCain energy policy, was almost entirely about oil, coal, and nuclear," LCV President Gene Karpinksi said. "Look past the setting, look past the speaker, and the policies she advocated today are the same policies we've seen from the last eight years of the Bush administration – policies that hurt the Ohioans working at Xunlight and other clean energy companies."

Palin's speech cavalierly downplayed the risks of environmental degradation of continued dependence on fossil fuels and offered no new concrete proposals for developing clean, renewable energy sources. And what of the biggest environmental challenge of our generation? Palin did not mention the impact of our energy future on global warming or climate change — an issue she has refused to acknowledge as being caused by human activity.

The speech was delivered at Xunlight Energy, a company that produces photovoltaic solar energy cells in Toledo, OH. Instead of offering new ideas to develop clean energy sources like solar, Palin ironically reprised the same old energy proposals that McCain has supported for years, wrapped in new distortions of Senator Obama's plans and couched in a false clean energy setting.

After praising the workers of Xunlight, Palin then belittled their product: "We have many, many new energy sources like solar and wind and geothermal that have not become economic and reliable."

Senator McCain, Palin's running mate, has routinely failed to support bills that would have created tax breaks and incentives for Xunlight Energy. McCain has stood in the way of measures that would have helped that Xunlight create jobs in Ohio and produce more reliable and economic clean energy.

On August 4, 2008, in a press release entitled "Palin Pleased With Obama's Energy Plan," the Alaska Governor praised Obama's energy plan, acknowledging the Obama proposal to offer $1,000 rebates to those struggling with the high cost of energy. Contrary to her backwards statements today, Senator Obama's energy plan is the most comprehensive plan to end this country's addiction to oil ever put forward by a Presidential nominee.

"Overall, Governor Palin's speech was light on specifics for clean energy, sour in its tone compared to earlier praise of the Obama energy plan and crude in its assessment of America's energy future," said Karpinski concluded.

Last week LCV released a web video on the McCain's woeful record on clean, renewable energy: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=ALkfRP2IefQ

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 08/15/08

Main Topics: Russia, Saddleback Candidate Forum, Faith and Religion

Summary of Shift:
Political news continues to be dominated by the Russian Georgian conflict. Clips of Rice and Bush demanding a cease-fire and withdrawal were continuously played on all major networks. Jerome Corsi's book and Obama's response also received a large portion of media coverage. Rick Warren appeared on several networks to speak about the upcoming candidate forum sponsored by his Saddleback Church. The forum brought up segments on both candidates faith and religious ties.

All other news consisted of Olympic updates. Michael Phelps is one gold away from tying the all time record for most gold medals won in a single Olympic game. The US took gold and silver in the women's all around gymnastics competition.

Highlights:
1. FNC: Jerome Corsi supports his book and talks about death threats and Obama camp response
2. FNC: Fox highlights McCain's recent comments about religion and faith during POW days
3. ABC: McCain and Obama's faith and politics of religion scrutinized ahead of weekend forum
4. CNN: McCain's messiah ad stirring Obama Anti-Christ rumors, playing into evangelical fears
5. FNC: Rick Warren refuses to endorse a candidate despite his conservative views

Highlights, No Clips:
1. CNN – KIRAN CHETRY: "Singer Jackson Browne suing John McCain and the Republican Party over the use of his famous song, "Running on Empty". A campaign ad used the song to mock Obama's suggestion that Americans check their tire pressure. Browne says that, besides violating copyright laws, the use of the song suggests he backs McCain, which he does not. McCain campaign says they had nothing to do with the ad. The Ohio republican party was behind it."
2. CNN – JOHN ROBERTS: "T. Boone Pickens, the billionaire oil tycoon turned wind energy magnet, meeting with John McCain for breakfast this morning. Pickens says he's critical of both candidates energy plans."

Highlight #1
Jerome Corsi Supports His Book and Talks About Death Threats and Obama Camp Response (FNC 08/15/08 8:26am)
STEVE DOOCY: It's the number one book on the New York Times Best-Sellers List, it's right here it's called "Obama Nation". […] I should point out that it's going to be number one with a little dagger. The New York Times is saying that your book, Obama Nation, is being bought in bulk by a bunch of conservatives.

JEROME CORSI: Well, it's not true. The sales are all retail sales, I defy the New York Times to tell which conservatives are buying the book and putting them away in warehouses. It's not happening.

DOOCY: Alright, so you've written this book, […] meanwhile the Obama is circulating this, it's called "Unfit for Publication". And it's forty pages where it essentially calls you a liar and a bigot.

CORSI: Yes, well, I think some juvenile leftists have taken over the Obama campaign and gotten a hold of Photoshop. I mean, first of all now I'm getting death threats and hate mail from Obama supporters, and we […] are tempted to start publishing them to see the level at which the Obama campaign is descendant on personal attacks. As I point out many times, ad-homonym attacks, attacking me personally is the lowest form of argument, it's been considered a logical fallacy since Aristotle, it doesn't refute the claims of the book.

DOOCY: You're getting these death threats because you wrote a book, and in fact there's a website, Daily-Kos, that's published your home address?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CORSI: That's correct, and invited Obama supporters to come and harass my family. I mean, Steve, this is an attack, not on me, but on the first amendment. I've written the book, what is Senator Obama going to do if he's in the White House, he's going to come unglued if a foreign nation, who's an enemy, calls him a name, are they going to go berserk and start banging against the walls? Answer the issue of epithets and say, how dare they attack me? Say our enemy's racist? I mean this is really kind of juvenile behavior on the part of the Obama campaign.

DOOCY: You were involved in the writing of the swift boat book four years ago. And so a lot of people have suggested, well the Obama campaign is not going to allow their candidate to get swift-boated, once again, by this guy. And do you feel almost, that you, yourself are being swift-boated?

CORSI: Well, in a way. But I also think the Obama campaign is making the identical mistakes of the Kerry campaign. They've started now calling me names, and trying to get the New York Times to introduce me as a gad-fly, and try to get the A.P. to do press releases for them. I couldn't find this 41 page reports on the websites until 1am. And so now, there's substantive issues in here. You know, they say I got incorrect the date of Senator Obama's marriage. Well, what would be really helpful is if Senator Obama would release primary documents, like his birth certificate. The campaign has a false, fake birth certificate posted on their website. How is anybody supposed to really piece together his life?

DOOCY: What do you mean they posted a false birth certificate on their website?

CORSI: The original birth certificate of Obama has never been released and the campaign refuses to release it. […] As I point out in Obama Nation, and by the way I don't know what chapters in here the campaign is so afraid the people are going to read. They must be desperately afraid of this book.

DOOCY: Well, what they've done is they've taken points from your book and they say, this is a lie and then they clarify it. And if people would like to read what they say about it, it's certainly out there on the internet, I believe it is on the Obama website.

CORSI: And I'll be issuing rebuttals, now that we've got some response, I'll be going through this point by point. Many of these are quibbles of minor details. Also differences of argumentation, and some of them are also wrong.

DOOCY: Just answer the question that they say right in the beginning of this. That you're a liar. You don't want Obama to be president and you're a liar.

CORSI: As I say, the book was written to be truthful and the substantive charges, that Barack Obama was with Sal Olinski, that he has a communist mentor in high school, and they don't refute those substantive points. They're quibbling about detail.

Highlight #2
Fox Highlights McCain's Recent Comments About Religion and Faith During POW Days (FNC 08/15/08 7:35am)
STEVE DOOCY: Meanwhile, let's talk a little bit about religion. In fact, this morning in the Chicago Tribune, John McCain is discussing how his faith helped him as a POW in Vietnam.

GRETCHEN CARLSON: That's a first, because he normally does not talk, number one that much about his POW experience, or about his faith.

DOOCY: Exactly right. Here's what he said, and this is quite a quotation, McCain says, "There were many times I didn't pray for another day, and I didn't pray for another hour. I prayed for another minute to keep going.
He should talk about that more.

BRIAN KILMEADE: What I found out when he was in prison, when he was hooked up with the other guys, the other POWs, he was in charge of giving the sermon, so he had to read the bible, interpret the bible, on a daily basis. John McCain was.

CARLSON: He should talk about that more. I mean, I'm no political pundit but I would maybe recommend that.

Highlight #3
McCain and Obama's Faith and Politics of Religion Scrutinized Ahead of Weekend Forum (ABC 08/15/08 7:29am)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DIANE SAWYER: Speaking of Senator Obama and John McCain, they are going to be making their first joint appearance of this final campaign tomorrow, taking part in a forum moderated by mega-church Pastor Rick Warren. He says he wants to ask them probing questions about religion and personal values. […]

JAKE TAPPER: […] Well religion has played a huge roll in this campaign which may be why it doesn't seem all that unusual that the first joint appearance for Obama and McCain would be here in the Los Angeles area, at the Saddleback Church, home congregation of best-selling author and pastor, Rick Warren.

John McCain has had other complications. Never wildly popular among conservative Christian leaders, he's never really seemed comfortable talking about his faith. Raised Episcopalian, he now attends a Baptist church.

MCCAIN: I'm unashamed and unembarrassed about my deep faith in God. But, I do not, obviously, try to impose my views on others.

TAPPER: Tomorrow, both men will be quizzed by Pastor Rick Warren.

RICK WARREN: We're going to look at leadership. Specifically, their character, their competence, their experience. […]

TAPPER: A lot of evangelicals don't see John McCain as one of their own. Is that fair?

WARREN: I think it's fair, I think a lot of evangelicals don't see Barack Obama as one of their own. Many evangelicals think neither of these guys are evangelical. I think both John McCain and Barack Obama, and their relationship to Jesus Christ, is their relationship.

[…]

Highlight #4
McCain's Messiah Ad Stirring Obama Anti-Christ Rumors, Playing into Evangelical Fears (CNN 08/15/08 09:46am)
HEIDI COLLINS: Just a joke? Or playing into fears? A campaign ad is causing a buzz on the internet.

DAVID MATTINGLY: When you listen to this John McCain ad, it might sound like Barack Obama has a messiah complex. […] The McCain campaign says it's all in good fun. But not everyone's laughing. Some democrats say the ad, which appears only on the internet, is infused hidden messages to evangelical Christians. Messages that Barack Obama isn't the messiah at all.

STEVE WALDMAN: It reinforces things that they've been hearing, around the internet, that maybe Barack Obama is in fact the Anti-Christ.

MATTINGLY: The ad's been viewed 1.2 million times on YouTube. A Google search for Obama and Anti-Christ returns an incredible 900 thousand hits. One website is completely dedicated to the question, is Obama the Anti-Christ? 73 percent of the sites online polls say, either yes or maybe. Could the McCain ad be saying the same thing? Critics accuse the McCain campaign of trying to tap into biblical prophecy to stir evangelical voters. A group McCain has had difficulty reaching.

ERIC SAPP: Going back to the classic republican playbook of playing to these people's fears, trying to send a message to these folks that you really need to be careful. You really need to worry about this guy, he literally could be a cosmic antichrist figure. And for a lot of people that may sound strange to believe, but there is a significant part of the American community that will take this stuff very seriously.

MATTINGLY: Democratic Faith Issues Consultant Eric Sapp argues the McCain ad borrows ideas and visual imagery from the blockbuster "Left Behind" series. The books weave a tale of a modern day Anti-Christ, a young political leader who rises to power with a message of peace and unity and leads a world religion that proclaims we are god. That sounds a lot like this Obama clip used in the ad.

[Anti-Obama Ad]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MATTINGLY: The McCain says it's just having fun with what it calls Obama's tendency to get carried away with audacious statements. But since the release of the ad, Obama Anti-Christ internet traffic is up. Even the authors of the "Left Behind" books felt they had to speak out because they are seeing that question more and more often. Do they think Obama is the Anti-Christ. And each time they say the answer is no way.

JERRY JENKINS: The Anti-Christ will not be someone who is suspected of being the Anti-Christ by anybody. If half the country thinks one of the candidates is the Anti-Christ he's not the Anti-Christ.

MATTINGLY: A spokesman for the McCain campaign calls the ad lighthearted. One website takes the joke a little further, selling t-shirts and mugs showing the Obama symbol with a pair of horns.

Highlight #5
Rick Warren Refuses to Endorse a Candidate Despite his Conservative Views (FNC 08/15/08 8:59am)
GRETCHEN CARLSON: […] "You are not going to endorse either of these candidates, at least publicly. But you do oppose abortion, you define marriage as the union of a man and a woman, if people look at that they might think you're siding with John McCain."

RICK WARREN: Well you know what, I'm not just pro-life, I'm whole life. I'm concerned about that baby girl before she's born, but I'm also concerned about that baby girl after she's born. Whether she's born into poverty, whether she gets an education, whether she's born addicted to crack or born with aides. So we're whole life by expanding my agenda, but it's really not about me, it's about what Barack Obama believes, it's about what John McCain believes. I think there will be a lot of people that will say well I disagree with Obama on this and I disagree with McCain on that, but I happen to like this about Obama and I happen to like this about McCain. And they are going to have to weigh their options. […]

CARLSON: What do you say to the critics who say your type of religion may be the watering down of religion, that maybe your putting ahead social justice as opposed to the, what they deem the real message of being a Christian. How do you respond to that?

WARRREN: Well first I flatly deny it because Saddleback Church has won more people to Jesus Christ than any church in America. In the last 20 years, excuse me, in the last 10 years we have baptized over 20,000 new adult converts. I am for the good news of Jesus Christ, that he is the answer to all of our problems, and he's the only way to heaven. But I'm also for the common good, and my goal is to say what's best for America in this particular thing. Now I believe that both the left and the right, you know you get attacked from both sides because when you try to do a middle ground you got enemies on both sides.

Our collective view on the video yesterday sounds the same as it is today.

a) It won't stop questions from being shouted at her the first time the press can
b) She is going to have to take and answer the question from the press herself at some point whether she does the video today or not.

And while there may not be consensus on this – my view on releasing a video first is that the press will eviscerate her for hiding behind a video instead of answering their questions.

War Puts Focus on McCain's Hard Line on Russia (NYT 8/12/08)
By MICHAEL COOPER
The intensifying warfare in the former Soviet republic of Georgia has put a new focus on the increasingly hard line that Senator John McCain has taken against Russia in recent years, with stances that have often gone well beyond those of the Bush administration and its focus on engagement.

In candidates' approaches, clear contrast (Boston Globe 8/12/08)
By Michael Kranish
Senator John McCain, who has met the Republic of Georgia's president and whose chief foreign policy adviser has lobbied for the country, responded to the news Friday with visceral anger, condemning Russian forces' crossing into Georgia and warning of "grave" repercussions in long-term relations between Moscow and Washington. Senator Barack Obama, who has never been to Georgia, initially seemed reticent to single out Russia for criticism, issuing a general call on Friday for ending "the outbreak of violence." The next day, as the scope of Russia's military action became clearer, the Democrat toughened his rhetoric and denounced Russia's "aggressive action" while calling for more diplomacy.

Candidates' Health Care Plans: Private Vs. Public (NPR 8/12/08)
by Julie Rovner
McCain and Obama have very different prescriptions for solving the problem of ballooning health care costs, says Jonathan Oberlander, a professor of health politics and policy at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. "There are many issues where Obama and McCain differ," he said. "I'm not sure there's any issue where they differ as much as this. Sometimes we complain in politics that Democrats and Republicans run to the center, and they copy each other with their proposals. At least in health care, we don't have to worry about that."

In Florida's living rooms, the presidential contest so far has been a landslide -- Barack Obama, 9,785; John McCain, zero. That is the tally of local television commercials broadcast by each candidate in the state, whose 27 electoral votes Sen. McCain almost certainly needs to win the White House. Recent polls in Florida show Sen. McCain holding a small edge.

Obama hits McCain with own negative ad (Washington Times 8/12/08)
Christina Bellantoni Sen. Barack Obama's camp on Monday depicted Sen. John McCain as a "lurching" lobbyist lover using "old" Washington politics, a harsh response to his Republican rival's "celebrity" ad that a new poll shows may actually help Mr. Obama. A Fox 5/Washington Times/Rasmussen Reports poll found that 84 percent of adults think the presidential hopefuls are running negative ads, and 44 percent of them said the ads have made them more likely to vote for Mr. Obama.

Pelosi to McCain: You weren't even here (Politico blog 8/11/08)

In an interview with Larry King, Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) scoffed at John McCain's call to bring Congress back into session to deal with high oil prices. "Well, it's interesting to hear Sen. Pelosi was referring to bills on tax credits for renewable sources of energy and hybrid cars. McCain leads the Senate in missed votes this Congress. Cosmological Wisdom and Planetary Madness

by Sean Kelly

Introduction:

It is a bitter irony of our times that, just as the collaborative effort of natural scientists and other researchers have revealed the outlines, at least, of a comprehensive cosmology,[i] we should find ourselves plunged into a maelstrom of unparalleled planetary madness. The madness: runaway catastrophic climate change, an accelerating mass extinction of species and generalized ecological deterioration, and a brutal, empire-driven regime of planetary apartheid. The wisdom: among the proposals for "Big History" type grand narratives[ii] , Swimme and Berry's The Universe Story (1992) that I will draw from in these pages. It is a story that encompasses the mysterious origin in a "primal flaring forth" (popularly referred to as the Big Bang), a growing, if perhaps never complete, understanding of the main stages of cosmic evolution, the complexities of embodied intelligence, the main thresholds of human history and the varieties of cultural expression, a sense of the lure or telos of the evolutionary adventure, and a prescient sense of growing planetary crisis.

The details of such a narrative have and continue to be provided by the assiduous efforts of countless individuals working in their respective fields of specialization. The real keepers of such narratives, however, are those (scientists or not) who dare to transgress the otherwise sensible mutual isolation of individual disciplines (and even inter- and multi-disciplines), and who are called instead, however provisionally, to articulate the nature of the Whole. In this case, the Whole includes not only the strictly physical or material-energetic dimension—whether on the large, small, or medium scale—but also the depth dimension of consciousness, interiority, meaning, and purpose. It is only when the Whole, or cosmos if one prefers, is considered in both these dimensions that the narrative becomes truly grand and a candidate, at least, for an expression of cosmological wisdom.

Cosmological:

For present purposes, I focus on an expression of such wisdom that I find both economical and particularly generative—namely, Swimme and Berry's proposal for a threefold "cosmogenetic principle," (Swimme and Berry, 71) or as I prefer to call it, a trinity of cosmogenetic principles. These principles—differentiation, autopoiesis, and communion—"refer to the governing themes and the basal intentionality of all existence" (71) and can be said to reveal the deep structure of cosmogenesis. They are three mutually implicated dimensions or moments of the emergence, persistence, and evolution of form "throughout time and space and at every level of reality" (71). Swimme and Berry invoke these principles to help us understand the integral nature of cosmic evolution, from the primal flaring forth (with the mysterious relation between the original singularity—if indeed there was a singularity—and the initial break in symmetry, with its perfect, fine-tuned calibration between gravitation and the forces of expansion or spatiation and also among the four fundamental forces), through the emergence of particles, atoms, galaxies, stars (especially our own Sun), and planets (especially Earth or Gaia), to the emergence of life, human societies, and civilizations. In all cases they underline how the three principles "are themselves features of each other." (73) In fact, as they say, if were there no differentiation, "the universe would collapse into a homogenous smudge; were there no subjectivity [which Swimme and Berry associate with autopoiesis], the universe would collapse into inert, dead extension; were there no communion, the universe would collapse into isolated singularities of being" (73)

I. Wisdom:

Swimme and Berry state that their understanding of the cosmogenetic principle is based on post hoc generalization from consideration of the manifest cosmos rather than on some a priori metaphysical (whether philosophical or theological) concept or doctrine. At the same time, however, it must be conceded that this principle is remarkably coherent with expressions of the nature of wisdom in triadic form found in the world's great metaphysical traditions (see Kelly, 2010). We know that, before turning to scientific cosmology, Berry had undertaken a deep study of Asian traditions, particularly Neo-Confucianism. The great Neo-Confucian Zhu Xi, for instance, > discerned a tripartite patterning or principle of the emergence of the person, and by extension, all the other objects or events of the world in terms of form or principle [li], dynamics or vital force [qi] and their unification via the mind-heart [xin]: the mature schematic is form, dynamics and unification. Moreover, once this unification of the principle and vital force was achieved and perfected, the outcome, at least for the human person, was a state of harmony or balance. (Berthrong)

Zhu Xi was influenced by the earlier Tiantai "original enlightenment" school of Buddhism, where we find the notion of the "threefold contemplation in one mind" ( )—that is, the integral nature of the three truths of emptiness, conventional existence, and the middle. In the words of a later Japanese Tendai commentary on the threefold contemplation (isshin sangan):

> Everything from our own speech to the sound of the waves rising or the wind blowing is the threefold contemplation in a single mind, the originally inherent three thousand realms [i.e., all dharmas]. There is nothing to cultivate and nothing to attain.... The forms of all things exerting their functions and arising in dependence upon conditions, is, without transformation, the threefold contemplation in its totality. (Stone, 178)

I am not suggesting an unambiguous identification of the three cosmogenetic principles of autopoiesis, differentiation, and communion (my preferred order) with the Neo-Confucian triad of li, qi, and xin, or the Tendai triad of emptiness (kuutai), conventional existence (ketai), and the middle (chuutai). I do believe, however, that all three triads participate in the same archetypal complex, or "cultural invariant", to use Raimon Panikkar's term, which he calls the "radical Trinity." "I may also use a consecrated name:," he writes, "advaita ["not twoness"], which is the equivalent of the radical Trinity. Everything is related to everything but without monistic identity or dualistic separation." (Panikkar, 2010, 404) The most encompassing expression of the radical Trinity is the integral or non-dual "theanthropocosmic" intuition of "Reality comprising the Divine, the Human, and the Cosmic in thoroughgoing relationality." (xviii) "We are together with other Men," Pannikkar observes, "on a common Earth, under the same Sky, and enveloped by the Unknown." (268) These three terms remind one of the traditional Chinese triad of Heaven, Humanity, and Earth. In Panikkar's case, however, though deeply informed by both the non-dualism of Hindu advaita vedanta and the Buddhist notion of dependent co-arising (pratityasamutpada, which he translates as “interindependence”), the deeper source is speculative Christian Trinitarian theology (with which Berry was obviously also familiar, despite his lack of formal training in theology and his self-designation as a “geologian”). The key insight here is the “perichoretic”, or mutually generating, relation among the three “persons” of the Trinity. “For Panikkar,” as summarized by Rowan Williams, > the Trinitarian structure is that of a source, inexhaustibly generative and always generative, from which arises form and determination, "being" in the sense of what can be concretely perceived and engaged with; that form itself is never exhausted, never limited by this or that specific realization, but is constantly being realized in the flux of active life that equally springs out from the source of all. Between form, "logos", and life, "spirit", there is an unceasing interaction. The Source of all does not and cannot exhaust itself simply in producing shape and structure; it also produces that which dissolves and re-forms all structures in endless an undetermined movement, in such a way that all form itself is not absolutized but always turned back toward the primal reality of the Source. (xviii)

Echoing Swimme and Berry’s statement quoted above regarding the mutual implication of the three cosmogenetic principles, Pannikar states: “God without Man is nothing, literally ‘no-thing’. Man without God is exclusively a ‘thing’ not a person, not a really human being, while the World, the Cosmos, without Man and God is ‘any-thing without consistency and being; it is sheer non existing chaos. The three are constitutively connected.’” (Panikkar, 1979, quoted in Sabetta)

Like Panikkar’s “cosmotheanthropic” vision, Swimme and Berry see their cosmogenetic principles active throughout the entire universe story. It is in our middle realm or Midgard of Earth or Gaia, however, that we see the principles in action most clearly and consequentially.

II. Planetary:

1. autopoiesis and climate catastrophe

The auto-poietic or self-organizing dynamics of the Earth are apparent from the time, 4.45 billion years ago, that the now cooling planet brought forth the early atmosphere, oceans, and continents, the main organs of planetary physiology. In contrast with the other planets of our solar system, the Earth was graced with just the right mass, in just the right position, to allow for an exquisite dynamic balance of gravitational, nuclear, and electromagnetic forces, allowing it to become “the advanced edge of cosmogenesis in the solar system.” (Swimme and Berry, 84) The Earth continues to be geologically very active (Mars and Venus, by contrast, are geologically frozen). This activity is not only due to its unique physical-energetic profile, however, but to the presence of life, which emerged remarkably early some 4 billion ago. While the appearance of the first organisms can be considered as initially local emergent properties of early Gaian physiology, life quickly pervaded the oceans and began colonizing the continents, constituting a new Gaian sphere in its own right—the biosphere. As Bruce Clarke notes: “Autopoiesis and Gaia fit together as interlocking, micro- and macro- modes of systems theory: biological autopoiesis defines the minimal formal requirements for living systems, beginning with the cell, and Gaia captures the ‘planetary physiology’ of the biosphere, for which the atmosphere is the autopoietic membrane.” (Clarke)

One of the great insights of Lovelock and Margulis’s Gaia theory—an insight presupposed by all subsequent Earth system science—is that the chemical composition of this membrane was established and maintained by the evolution of the biosphere, which itself depends upon the life-constituted atmosphere for its continuing existence. From the reduction of the carbon-rich early atmosphere by the prokaryotes (single cell organisms without a nucleus)—which precipitated the first ice age—through the subsequent oxygen crisis and its eventual resolution some 550 million years ago (since that time, atmospheric oxygen has stabilized between 15-35%), the biosphere “altered the terrestrial unfolding. Earth’s adventure became a conversation among the hydrosphere, lithosphere, biosphere, and atmosphere.” (Swimme and Berry, 93)

This millennial, or billennial, conversation has deteriorated in our own times, however, into a literally deadening monologue. For the first time in over 800,000 years, concentrations of atmospheric CO2 have surpassed 400 ppm. As a result, at the time of writing, the combined average global temperature across both land surfaces and oceans has already increased by .87 degrees C relative to the 20thC average. At just less than one degree of warming, we are witnessing significant increases in extreme weather events (storms, floods, heat waves), changes in patterns of precipitation, intensifying droughts, major fluctuations in the jet stream, acidification of the oceans (which have been acting as the major carbon sink) and indications of possible disruption of major ocean currents. The warming in the Artic is three times higher than the global average. This is especially significant due to the critical role played by Artic ice in cooling the planet. To begin with, Artic ice reflects up to 90% of sunlight back into space—the so-called albedo effect. Especially given the higher level of warming, Artic ice is melting, decreasing the albedo, which increases the rate of warming, resulting in ice-albedo feedback. Complicating matters are the enormous stores of methane stored in both permafrost beneath the ice and in the form of hydrates in the Artic ocean. The danger here, assuming a worst case scenario, is that > further warming of the Arctic Ocean will unleash huge methane eruptions from the Arctic Ocean seafloor, in turn driving temperatures up even higher and causing more intense wildfires, heatwaves and further extreme weather events.... A polynomial trendline points at global temperature anomalies of over 4°C by 2060. Even worse, a polynomial trend for the Arctic shows temperature anomalies of over 4°C by 2020, 6°C by 2030 and 15°C by 2050, threatening to cause major feedbacks to kick in, including albedo changes and methane releases that will trigger runaway global warming that looks set to eventually catch up with accelerated warming in the Arctic and result in global temperature anomalies of 16°C by 2052. (Arctic News; or the most recent consensus view, only slightly less alarming see also see also Mooney)

Even if this worst case scenario does not pan out, the fact remains that the most recent IPCC report, which has set 2°C of warming as the upper limit beyond which we can expect irreversible catastrophic climate change (climate scientist James Hansen, by contrast, who first warned of the danger of global warming the 1980s, claims that 1°C is already catastrophic), does not factor in the feedback from the release of Artic methane.

The literature on global warming and climate science is increasing exponentially, and there is no way I could summarize even the most relevant recent findings, projections, and analyses. While many of these are contested, and all carry a degree of uncertainty, it can be said with increasing confidence (though the word “confidence” seems emotionally out of place here) that the situation is dire. Even the most likely best case scenarios seem to involve massive climate disruption and associated environmental catastrophe and likely civilizational collapse.

The irony of the situation, as stated in the introduction, is that the climate crisis has become the primary occasion for a growing public awareness of the self-organizing character of the Earth system. Though perhaps not conversant with the details of complex dynamical systems, more and more non-specialists understand what is meant by “tipping points” and “positive feedback”. More importantly, this awareness is coupled with the realization that human beings, far from being outside observers of the “environment”, are integral to the planetary system. The climate change in question is largely “anthropogenic”. What this means, theoretically, is that a more adequate view of the Earth or Gaia must include, alongside or interwoven with the geosphere and biosphere, an anthroposphere as its most recent epigenetic expression.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Since autopoiesis, linked as it is to systemic closure, identity, and memory, points "to the interior dimension of things" (Swimme and Berry, 75), one could say that the emergence of the anthroposphere represents the stage in the evolution of Earth where the self-organizing dynamics of Gaia bring forth, in explicit relief, the latent potential of the biosphere for self-conscious, value-driven, agency. Of course, at this point, the quality of this self-consciousness is at best fragmentary or at least functionally dissociated. Despite a growing global awareness of the threat of climate catastrophe, the overwhelming inertia of human actions and the values supporting them are in the direction of business as usual, which is to say, in support of the interests of global capitalism, in general, and of the fossil fuel industry, in particular. The dissociation is well captured in the subtitle to Naomi Klein's epochal book, This Changes Everything: Capitalism vs. the Climate. (Klein) "So we are left with a stark choice," she writes: "allow climate disruption to change everything about our world, or change pretty much everything about our economy to avoid that fate." (22) And not just the economy, of course, since "we need to think differently, radically differently, for those changes to be remotely possible.... For any of this to change, a worldview will need to rise to the fore that sees nature, other nations, and our own neighbors not as adversaries, but rather as partners in a grand project of mutual invention." (23)

2. differentiation and mass extinction

The cosmogenetic principle of differentiation manifests itself in the evolution of the Earth from its inception as the variegated cloud of stellar elements that gathered to form the initial ball of molten rock (there are 92 known naturally occurring elements; oxygen, iron, silicon, and magnesium account for 90% of the mass of the geosphere). The settling of core, mantle, and crust, and then the primary organs of continents, oceans, and atmosphere manifest the larger scale geophysiological differentiation (in terms of elements, the oceans are 86% oxygen and 11% hydrogen by mass, while the atmosphere is 78% nitrogen and 21% oxygen by volume). Though the early biosphere, constituted of single-cell organisms, was relatively homogenous, life would eventually differentiate into a staggering diversity of expression. It is estimated that over five billion species have emerged from the autopoietic creativity of Earth, a little more than one species for every year of its existence to date. 99% of these, however, have perished, mostly during the past five mass extinction events.

Though the news was slow in making its way into the mainstream media, it is now widely recognized that we are currently in the beginning, though accelerating, phase of the six mass extinction event. (see Ceballos et al., and Pimm et al.)[iii] The previous, Cretaceous-Paleogene mass extinction of 65 million years ago took out some three quarters of the Earth's animal and plant species, including the non-avian dinosaurs, and was likely caused by the impact of a large meteor or comet that struck the Yucatan Peninsula. The current mass extinction underway, however, is happening much faster, and it is entirely due to human activity. Like the current global climate crisis, in other words, the sixth mass extinction is anthropogenic. Though this would seem to bolster the choice of the term "Anthropocene" to describe the new geological age that humans have initiated (bringing the prior 65 million year Cenozoic to a close), the fact that humans are also on the potential extinction list should cast considerable doubt, or at least irony, on this choice of terms. While it is true that the previous mass extinctions made way for new waves of speciation—diversification through annihilation, one could say—it is quite possible that the striking exfoliations of life following the Permian and Cretaceous extinctions were Gaia's last great gestures of biological exuberance. In any case, since it has taken many millions of years for the biosphere to recover from past extinctions, and since the average life span of mammalian species is one million years, it is highly unlikely that humans will be around to enjoy what other life forms manage to survive.

The major drivers of the current mass extinction include habitat loss (especially forests and wetlands), ecological degradation (including mono-cultures, invasive species, pollution), species exploitation (over-fishing, hunting), ocean acidification (a special case of pollution), and of course global warming. Global warming not only exacerbates the other drivers, but is coupled with them, and especially habitat loss and ecological degradation, in a death-dealing positive feedback loop. The main driver, however, is the activity of the anthroposphere itself, whose global footprint, under the capitalist regime of industrial growth society, is currently at one and a half Earths and projected to be at three Earths by 2050 (that is, it would take three Earths to provide the resources consumed and to absorb the wastes produced). (see Global Footprint Network) Of course, there is only one Earth, and most of what will be consumed or lost (fossil fuels, the remaining old growth forests, countless species) can never be replaced. As far as the current mass extinction and global warming are concerned (and the two, as I have said, are coupled in a mutually amplifying feedback loop), we seem to have a very short window—a decade at most—to turn things around and avoid the worst case scenario.

Though perhaps initially counterintuitive, the assault on Gaian biodiversity can be understood as the result of a hypertrophy of the principle of differentiation in the anthroposphere. A distinguishing character of the human is the ability to order its experience and its world through the mediation of symbols. Though symbolic consciousness is naturally associated primarily with language, it is present wherever categorial distinctions are in play. In social contexts, for instance, one finds the primal distinction between insider and outsider, divisions of labor, levels of status or privilege, and so on. In terms of the current planetary crisis, we could point to three related paradigmatic or meta-level expressions of hypertrophic differentiation. The first is patriarchy, which has dominated socio-cultural evolution throughout the historical period. Feminist scholars have demonstrated the intrinsic alliance between the subordination of women and women's value spheres, on the one hand, and the domination of nature or the material realm in general, on the other (see Merchant, Spretnak, Keller). As for the domination of nature, while it is true that humans have spoiled, denuded, or otherwise disrupted their natural environments for many thousands of years, it was not until the advent of modern science and technology—the second expression of hypertrophic differentiation—and particularly following the industrial revolution and the exploitation of fossil fuels, that humans became ecocidal on a planetary scale. The modern scientific paradigm is founded on the root metaphor of the cosmos as machine, the constitutive elements of which are thought of as lifeless and merely externally related to one another. Scientific knowledge is primarily instrumental, allowing for the prediction and control of objects for human use.

Again, however, even patriarchy and modern science and technology would not, by themselves, be able to lead the planet to the edge of catastrophe were it not for the third expression of hypertrophic differentiation—namely, global capitalism. Making full use of the other-dominating, instrumentalist attitudes and practices of the first two expressions, capitalism, to begin with in alliance with colonialism and then also in the form of corporatocracy, quickly became its own planet-wide autopoietic force. While it is the case that the universe story and the Gaian consciousness that it celebrates would not have emerged without this world-making force, its creative role is now overshadowed by its apocalyptic potential.

3. communion and Empire

Like the third moment in the Hegelian dialectic, or the Holy Spirit of the Christian Trinity, the third cosmogenetic principle—communion—is simultaneously presupposed by the first two, and the expression of their harmonious interplay. It is presupposed because there can be neither self-making nor differentiation without real internal and external relations. At the same time, true communion is impossible between essentially lifeless (no identity) or completely identical (no difference) entities. It is only with the full expression of communion, therefore, that the creative potential of the cosmogenetic principle can be fully actualized. "The universe," write Swimme and Berry, "evolves into beings that are different from each other, and that organize themselves. But in addition to this, the universe advances into community—into a differentiated web of relationships among sentient beings." (77) The principle of communion is evident at all scales of the cosmos and at all stages of the evolutionary journey: in the quantum entanglement of elementary particles; in the mutual gravitational attraction of galaxies, stars, and planets; in the miraculous origin of life in the prolonged courtship of organic molecules and lightning in the primordial oceans; in the symbiogenetic mergers that birthed the first eukaryotic cells; in the complex webs of ecosystem communication; in the millions of years of mammalian bondings; in the forgotten gatherings of archaic hominid societies; in the many histories, mostly unwritten, of creative human collaboration, mutual assistance, celebration....

"The loss of relationship," by contrast, "with its consequent alienation, is a kind of supreme evil in the universe.... To be locked up in a private world, to be cut off from intimacy with other beings, to be incapable of entering the joy of mutual presence—such conditions were taken [in traditional religious contexts] as the essence of damnation. (78) While every living being will, at one time or another, experience moments of alienation, and while human history is in no small measure a history of oppression, our own times are the first to be organized on the basis of systematic alienation on a planetary scale. Granting such remarkable achievements as the abolition of slavery, women's suffrage, and a widespread affirmation, in principle at least, of the ideal of universal human rights, it is nevertheless the case that approximately half the world population lives in extreme poverty and the deprivations with which it is associated. Thomas Pogge sums up the situation as follows:

> The collective income of all these people—the bottom half—is less than three percent of global household income, and so there is a grotesque maldistribution of income and wealth. The bottom quarter of the human population has only three-quarters of one percent of global household income, about one thirty-second of the average income in the world, whereas the people in the top five percent have nine times the average income. So the ratio between the averages in the top five percent and the bottom quarter is somewhere around 300 to one.... (Pogge)

The statistics on global wealth inequality are even more obscene, with the wealthiest 1% owning more than the remaining 99%. (see Elliot and Pilkington) Measures of relative wealth and poverty are perhaps the single most revealing indicators of the full range of inequalities, beginning with access to—or quality of—food, water, and shelter, and including access to education, social services, and other factors contributing to quality of life.

As it now stands, the world situation can be described as a kind of planetary apartheid. I use the word planetary instead of global here so as to include other than human beings in the equation, the larger portion of whom, as we have seen above, are on the verge of extinction.[iv] Along with the billions of humans living in misery, there are 10 billion animals (approximately 1.3 for every human being on the planet) reared in concentration camps (factory farms) each year for human use. The two classes of oppressed—human and other than human—are the victims of a single overarching system or regime, which can perhaps best be described with the term Empire. In David Korten's formulation, Empire is based on > the hierarchical ordering of human relationships [among humans and between humans and other than humans] based on the principle of domination. The mentality of Empire embraces material excess for the ruling classes, honors the dominator power of death and violence, denies the feminine principle, and suppresses the realization of the potentials of human [and other than human]maturity. (Korten, 20)

Unlike smaller empires throughout the historical period, the current global Empire does not have a single standing army to impose its rule. While the military industrial complex, or complexes, together constitute a significant player in the global economy, the rule of Empire is maintained through the pervasive power of global capitalism—which is to say, the private ownership (overwhelmingly by the 1%) of the forces of production. The latter include the various industries, the goods produced (whether material or informational), and the labor used to produce them, along with mechanisms not only to profit through the trading of financial capital, but the power literally to create money out of thin air (fiat currency). Marx was the first to articulate the ways in which individuals and classes are alienated under capitalist modes of production—alienated from the products of their labor, from the process of production, from other people, from the natural world.

There are three mutually enabling features of capitalism—an unholy trinity, if you will—that I would underline here, which I could describe in terms of motive, means, and mode. The main motive is cupidity or greed for gain, which takes the form of the pursuit of maximization of profit and continuous growth in revenues. This is achieved by various means, but must ultimately rely on the discovery or creation of new markets, cheap labor, the disposability or obsolescence of products, and the stimulation of desire for new products. As has now become obvious, the successful pursuit of continuous growth has also relied on the assumption of infinite resources (material and energetic) and the so-called externalization of costs to both human societies and the natural environment. The latter form of externalization, which amounts to a degradation of natural systems, exacerbates the effects of resource depletion through over-exploitation (for instance, ocean acidification from CO2 pollution amplifying collapse of marine species through over-fishing).

The means by which global capitalism achieves its motive is the private ownership of what would otherwise be—and arguably, what ought to be—owned in common. As long as one could ignore externalization of costs, it is at least understandable how people could be blind to the injustice of private ownership of productive forces. Unless one is persuaded, as I am, by the Marxist ethical analysis of how profit depends on alienated labor—on a form of theft, in other words—it might not be evident why, for instance, a creative and hard-working entrepreneur should not be able to own his own business—say, a chain of grocery stores that caters to educated, environmentally conscious consumers—especially if his employees are all paid above the minimum wage.

Where the wrong of private ownership of the commons (including labor) becomes glaringly obvious is when the nature of productive activity is set in its full ecological context—that is, in the planetary or Gaian commons in which we live and have our being. In this context, there can be no “externalization” of costs. This realization first came to public awareness with the cross-border effects of acid rain, but of course is now fully apparent and calling for decisive action in connection with the catastrophic effects of atmospheric CO2 generated by capitalist industries. Though less obvious, the same concern ought to be extended to the presence and continued release of radio-nucleotides, persistent organic chemicals, and other toxins into the biosphere. The presence of all such toxins, including CO2, though suffered by every living thing on the planet (and more immediately and intensely by the socio-economically disadvantaged), are the result of capitalist modes of production, and thus flow from the decisions of the 1% (who also reap most of the benefit). The same is true, of course, for the generalized degradation of the biosphere (habitat loss, decimation of plant and animal species through over-exploitation, industrial mono-cropping, etc.). The point, therefore, is that the greed-guided, private ownership of productive forces that constitutes capitalism is incompatible—in both real and ethical terms—with the fact of the global commons.[v]

The mode of global capitalism, or of Empire, can be described in terms of the root paradigmatic assumption of the dominant late-modern worldview. The latter has been characterized variously as mechanistic, techno-centric or technocratic, reductionistic, instrumentalist, rationalistic, economistic, and disenchanted. All of these terms presuppose a view of the universe as a “collection of objects” (Swimme and Berry, 243)—that is, as essentially inert things with merely extrinsic value (which, in the capitalist system, is defined in terms of commodities). Regardless of where one might stand, given their autopoietic nature, with respect to the subjectivity of fundamental particles, atoms, stars and galaxies, or even of the simpler organisms, it is now almost universally recognized that human beings are not objects to be bought or sold (this despite the persistence of human trafficking, and both wage and debt slavery). Because of the ecological solidarity of human beings with the Gaian system, however—a solidarity which means that the Earth is not merely our environment, but in a very real sense our extended body, which, through rampant privatization of the commons, is being bought and sold—we are brought once again to the fundamental contradiction of capitalism, again, well captured by the subtitle of Klein's book, This Changes Everything: Capitalism vs. the Climate, and the subtitle of Korten's earlier, more comprehensive work, The Great Turning: From Empire to Earth Community.

As an indication of the supraordinate character of the principle of communion, Swimme and Berry make the following claim: "That the universe is a communion of subjects rather than a collection of objects is the central commitment of the Ecozoic". (243) The term Ecozoic is their proposal for the geological age in process of succeeding the 65 million year Cenozoic. "The comprehensive objective of the Ecozoic," they affirm, > is to assist in establishing a mutually enhancing human presence on the Earth.... The immediate goal...is not simply to diminish the devastation of the planet that is taking place at present. It is rather to alter the consciousness that is responsible for such deadly activities. (250-251)

Swimme and Berry speak of the need to evoke a "counter to the commercial-industrial mystique" (250) that has "misenchanted" the modern mind. (Segall) Overriding traditional political and ideological divisions, they assert that > the dominant issue of the immediate future will be the tension between the Entrepreneur and the Ecologist, between those who would continue their plundering, and those who would truly preserve the natural world, between the mechanistic and the organic, between the world as collection of objects and the world as a communion of subjects, between the anthropocentric and the biocentric norms of reality and value. (250)

Conclusion: homo sapiens-demens and the Gaianthropocene

Though I agree with its spirit, I would amend the terms of the last opposition in the passage just quoted. It is certainly the case that the human presence on the planet has become ecocidal. To my mind, however, the root problem is not so much anthropocentrism per se as a mutilated understanding of anthropos, where the human has set itself, in deed if not in theory, above or outside of the cosmological reality in which it is in fact embedded. At the same time, however, it is equally true that this cosmological reality is only given to us as mediated through our specifically human life-world. It is, after all, human science and reflection that have brought forth the universe story. Practically speaking, moreover, it is the case, as Swimme and Berry themselves recognize, that if "the emergence of the Cenozoic in all its brilliance was independent of any human influence, almost every phase of the Ecozoic will involve the human. While the human cannot make a blade of grass, there is liable not to be a blade of grass unless it is accepted, protected, and fostered by the human." (247) It is for these reasons that there is a growing consensus around the term Anthropocene to describe the dawning geological era. The danger of this term, however, is that it will amplify the hubris in the dominant, mutilated and myopic understanding of the human as preeminently homo faber, technologicus, or economicus.

As for the self-designation of humans as homo sapiens sapiens, the lone survivor among the genus homo, one might understandably question the unqualified attribution of the term "wise", let alone its doubling (the "wisest among the wise"). We have, it is true, the undisputed brilliance of human intelligence as seen not only in our own times with the grand, if still and perhaps forever incomplete narrative of the universe story, and more generally in the awesome variety of human cultural expression (in art, religion, and philosophy; in the human and social sciences generally; in the myriad traditions of indigenous knowledge and practice). At the same time, the human story has also been one of violence and bigotry, of superstition and illusion, and at least throughout the historical period, of domination through war, slavery, dispossession, and persecution. In the last century, the destructive potential of our species reached planetary proportions with the first world wars and the three symptoms of planetary madness that I have focused on in these pages: climate catastrophe, mass extinction of species, and planetary apartheid. Given this shadow that has always accompanied the light in which we would like to behold ourselves, a more apt term for our species, as Edgar Morin has proposed, would be homo sapiens-demens, the "wise-mad" animal.

This potential for madness, however, is not limited to the aggression of the Freudian death instinct (thanatos). The demens in question, though it can and has expressed itself demonically, is also the source of the daimonic—that is, the imaginal, inspirational, ecstatic, and participatory modes of being in the world. The attempt to banish the daimonic is its own form of madness, a dissociation of that which is, or should be, complexly interwoven. "The bipolarity of sapiens-demens," writes Morin, > is the extreme expression of the existential bipolarity of the two kinds of life which > weave our lives, one serious, utilitarian, and prosaic, the other playful, aesthetic, poetic.... Moreover, sapiens is within demens and demens is within sapiens, as with the yin and yang, each one containing the other. Between one and the other, in a manner both antagonistic and complementary, there is no clear boundary.... A totally rational, technical, and utilitarian life would not only be demented, but inconceivable. A life without any kind of rationality would be equally impossible…

> Human beings live not only through rationality and tools; they make use of and give themselves over to dance, trance, myth, magic, and ritual.... Play, celebration, rituals, are not simply forms of relaxation that allow one to return to the practical life of work. Belief in gods and ideas cannot be reduced to the status of illusion or superstition: they have roots that plunge into the depths of human nature.... This is the paradox, the richness, the prodigality, the discontent, the happiness of homo sapiens-demens. (Morin 2001, 131)

Acknowledging the truth of what is suggested by the term Anthropocene, though affirming the ideal of the Ecozoic as conceived by Swimme and Berry, the new era that we have initiated might best be described by the term Gaianthropocene. Like the bipolarity of homo sapiens-demens, the advantage of this term is that it suggests the complex character of the relation between humans and Earth. Complex because the nature and destiny of each term is interwoven with the other (com-plexere, to weave together). Though there was once an Earth without humans, there is will longer be an Earth without the presence of the human. Even after the passing of the last of our species, whether through self-induced extinction or through the inevitable demise of what remains of the biosphere (at the limit, when, in 3 billion years, the oceans begin to boil off from steadily increasing solar radiation), Earth's geochemistry, if nothing else, will still carry the signature of our world-transforming activities (for instance, to mention just one example, with the global presence and distribution of anthropogenic depleted uranium, whose half life is over 4.5 billion years).

The relation between Gaia and anthropos is also complex (in Morin's understanding of complexity) in that it is dialogical, recursive, holographic, and uncertain.[vi] It is dialogical because human being is both complementary (as a potentially synergistic partner) and antagonistic (to the point of ecocide) relative to the wider Gaian system. It is recursive in that, though an emergent product of Gaian evolution, the human has itself become a significant causal factor in this evolution. It is holographic insofar as each term, in important ways, both contains and is contained by the other (that humans are part of the encompassing whole that is Gaia should be obvious. That Gaia is contained by the human is most apparent with the idea and fact of the anthroposphere, the outermost though, as we have seen, most consequential layer of the Gaian system).

Finally, the relation is uncertain, not only relative to the ultimate ground and details of their respective origins and entwined histories, but also in their ultimate fates. While there is a relatively solid consensus around the likely demise of the planet in cosmological terms (a maximum life expectancy of another 3 or 4 billion years), in the near to middle term, at least, there is an unknown set of possible alternative futures. With each month and year that passes, however, a future that includes the kind of magnificent biodiversity that preceded and has always supported our species, if indeed a real possibility, becomes less and less probable. As the web of life itself continues to unravel, so too will the recently woven fabric of planetary civilization. We do not yet know, though surely some alive today will know, if we can halt our hurtling ever deeper into planetary madness. If there is hope, it is because we (many of us, at least) know what is at stake, know what must be done to have a fighting chance of avoiding the worst.

[i] By “comprehensive” I mean inclusive of the known universe at all levels of organization, from the microphysical to the large-scale cosmic. Of course I recognize that various theories (the singularity and Big Bang, for instance) in each of the individual disciplines are contested and that there is no universally recognized overall account or “meta-theory” encompassing all of the disciplines. Nevertheless, the widespread consensus around such things as universal expansion, the history of Earth, the evolution of species, and climate change give an indication of the breadth of agreement within and among major scientific disciplines.

[ii] The field or discipline of Big History traces its formal origins to the work of David Christian (2005), who coined the term. In fact, however, classics in the field include Swimme and Berry’s Universe Story (1992), Teilhard de Chardin’s Human Phenomenon (1955/1999), Carl Sagan’s Cosmos series (1980), Jacob Bronowski’s Ascent of Man (1973), and much earlier works, including especially von Humboldt’s Cosmos (1845), and the early 19C works of Lorenz Oken and Schelling, among others.

[iii] Ceballos et al. represents the most recent, conservative estimate of 100 times the background extinction rate; for the more likely rate of 1000 times, see Pimm et al..

[iv] For the meaning of the term global apartheid, see Mutassa.

[v] I know that many will say that the problem is not capitalism as such, but “predatory” or “unregulated” capitalism. If I am correct in my view of the motive, means, and mode of capitalism, however, capitalism is “predatory” by nature, which is why, if it is to exist at all, it needs to be heavily regulated! In this connection, see David Graeber’s piece on “savage capitalism” (Graeber).

[vi] For an extended discussion of Morin’s “paradigm of complexity”, see Kelly 2016.

While it was permitted for Secretary Clinton to use one blackberry instead of two, looking back she's said it would have been better for her to use two. At the time, this just didn't seem like an issue. She's asked State Department to publicly release all of roughly the 55,000 printed pages of emails she provided them.

Secretary Clinton was the first and only former Secretary to respond to the Department's request last year, and was the only one to provide her work emails.

Secretary Clinton has asked the Department to make her work related emails publicly available, and just like every other Cabinet Secretary and U.S. government official, she gets to choose to keep her personal emails private.

In turning over emails from his private account, she said, Mr. Bush and his staff "went through those emails and decided what were public-record emails and what wasn't. What they recommend is arranging an in-person meeting for the second round, and these could be done in DC on Dec. 19-20 if that makes it easier for you. They were also thinking that in between the first and second round, we could entertain flying a group of candidates out to San Francisco to meet Eric. We could also consider flying the candidates to Little Rock to meet with Bruce for that matter.

Media Matters for America: "Reported Central Contentions Of New Benghazi Book Already Debunked"

By Matt Gertz

September 2, 2014, 4:16 p.m. EDT

A new book that seeks to damage Hillary Clinton over the 2012 attacks in Benghazi reportedly relies on long-debunked conservative myths.

On September 9, WND Books will publish Aaron Klein's The REAL Benghazi Story: What the White House and Hillary Don't Want You to Know. The book's release is the latest salvo from a conservative cottage industry that aims to make money and political hay out of both Benghazi and Clinton smears.

Klein, a senior reporter for the birther site WND, is not a credible author -- one of his recent books portrayed President Obama as a "Manchurian Candidate" whose autobiography was ghostwritten by Bill Ayers.

The Washington Examiner's Paul Bedard, who reviewed an advance copy of Klein's Benghazi book, reported that Klein argues "Clinton was unwilling to provide additional security to the diplomatic outpost and even played a role in sending Stevens to his 'doomed mission.'"

Klein's contention that Clinton "was unwilling to provide additional security to the diplomatic outpost" seems to reference the long-debunked conservative claim that the then-Secretary of State personally signed off on cables rejecting requests for additional security. When congressional Republicans first made that claim in April 2013, diplomatic reporters noted that every cable sent to the State Department from overseas facilities is addressed to the secretary, and every cable sent from the State Department is signed by the secretary, even though the secretary rarely reviews them.

In her 2014 memoir, Clinton wrote that she had never seen the cables in question, stating, "That's not how it works. It shouldn't. And it didn't."

Klein's claim that Clinton "played a role in sending Stevens" to his death in Benghazi has also been debunked. The State Department's Accountability Review Board reported that Stevens "made the decision to travel to Benghazi independently of Washington, per standard practice," with the trip's timing "driven in part by commitments in Tripoli." Gregory Hicks, who was Stevens' deputy, also testified before Congress that the ambassador "chose to go" to Benghazi.

[Subtitle:] Fundraisers Say Gov. Martin O'Malley Tells Them Hillary Clinton Candidacy Wouldn't Stop Him

ANNAPOLIS, Md.—Democratic fundraisers say Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley has told them he would enter the presidential race even if front-runner Hillary Clinton is a candidate, suggesting she would face at least some competition for her party's nomination from an established elected official if she runs.

Mr. O'Malley's camp had signaled earlier this year that the governor likely wouldn't join the field if Mrs. Clinton sought the Democratic nomination. But some party fundraisers say they have come away from private conversations with Mr. O'Malley with a clear impression that he wouldn't stand down should Mrs. Clinton run.

As is the case with Mrs. Clinton, the governor says he is still deciding his course. Asked if he would compete against Mrs. Clinton, Mr. O'Malley, in a recent interview in the State House, said: "I'm not inclined to talk about that at this point. But I don't blame you for asking."

Despite his public reticence, Mr. O'Malley's message to fundraisers and other recent actions show him to be making the sorts of moves that would position him for an eventual run.

He will be the keynote speaker at a Sept. 26 Democratic Party fundraising dinner in New Hampshire, the state that holds the nation's first primary, and has dispatched a couple of dozen campaign staffers to states with competitive races in the midterms. He is planning a trip to California later in the month to raise money for a political-action committee he has used to give money to candidates and party committees in states that loom large in presidential races.

His PAC gave $5,000 to the New Hampshire Democratic Party in May and $2,500 to a New Hampshire Democratic congresswoman in July, federal election records show.

"He's building up a series of IOUs and he's showing a willingness to serve the party, and he thereby creates goodwill," said Lou D'Allesandro, a Democratic state senator in New Hampshire.

A two-term governor who leaves office in January, Mr. O'Malley signed a law raising the state's minimum wage to $10.10 an hour by 2018. Last year, after the shootings at an elementary school in Newtown, Conn., he signed legislation banning various kinds of assault weapons and imposing new limits on the size of gun magazines. The same year, he pushed through the first state gas-tax increase since 1992, which supporters said was needed to improve the state's aging transportation network.

This summer, Mr. O'Malley said unaccompanied minors illegally entering the U.S. shouldn't be returned to home countries where they would be in danger—a position at odds with the White House, which was warning that children who weren't eligible to remain in the U.S. would be sent home.

"He should have been more of a centrist if he really thought he was going to run for president," said Kathy Szeliga, GOP whip in the state house of delegates.

An O'Malley supporter disputes that. "The proof is in the pudding," said Maryland state Sen. James Rosapepe, a Democrat. "We lead the region in job creation, we have the best rated schools in the United States…So I think that's a very mainstream record that will appeal to people across the country.

Doug Goldman, a major fundraiser for President Barack Obama who lives in San Francisco, said he met with Mr. O'Malley privately in the spring. "Martin O'Malley is making it pretty clear that his ultimate goal is president of the United States," Mr. Goldman said. He said the governor indicated that, "Yes, that's the next step for him, that he is running."

Another Democratic fundraiser said he asked Mr. O'Malley in recent months what he would do if Mrs. Clinton entered the race. This person said he asked because he didn't want to spend time assisting with Mr. O'Malley's fundraising if in the end the governor would retreat in the face of a Clinton candidacy. He "told me flat out he's going to run either way," the person said.

A third Democratic fundraiser said Mr. O'Malley told supporters at an event last year in California without qualification that he was running for president.

Aides to Mr. O'Malley said it is possible donors misconstrued the governor's unwillingness to rule out a bid against Mrs. Clinton as a clear statement he would run against her. "Right now, he is thinking long and hard about this, and he will make his decision irrespective of what other people do," an O'Malley aide said.

Mr. O'Malley's deliberations come as Democrats debate whether Mrs. Clinton would clear the field should she run. Some of Mr. O'Malley's supporters, along with prominent Democrats nationally, say the better course would be to have a meaningful primary-election debate about the party's direction.

"Competition is really good," said Terry Lierman, who has raised campaign money for Mr. O'Malley. "It's good in business, it's good in sports and it's essential in politics. It makes better candidates.…I don't think Martin O'Malley or any candidate should be scared by another candidate."

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, Nick Merrill, said Tuesday: "She as much as anyone knows that running for president is a very personal and weighty decision that people need to make on their own, based on whatever factors they want to take into account."

For Mr. O'Malley, a major hurdle is building a national profile. A July Gallup Poll showed that, among Democrats and those who lean toward the party, 84% had either never heard of or had no opinion of him. Polls have consistently shown Mrs. Clinton with far more support than Mr. O'Malley, Vice President Joe Biden and other Democrats.

"In 2008 Hillary Clinton was the favorite to win," said Bill Burton, who was part of the 2008 Barack Obama campaign team that defeated Mrs. Clinton. "But in 2016 her infrastructure is so much bigger and her resources will be so much grander and the ability to spend money will be so much more vast than it was in '08 that it would be very tough for a primary contender to beat her."

MSNBC: "Glenn Beck: 'Hillary Clinton will be the next president'"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

September 2, 2014, 5:53 p.m. EDT

He may have once called President Barack Obama the racist puppet of a vast global conspiracy, but conservative talk show host Glenn Beck seems to be more sanguine about his potential replacement, Hillary Clinton.

Beck, who left Fox News in 2011 to start his own media empire, predicted this week that the former secretary of state will be the next president, and not through any kind of trickery or skullduggery.

"Hillary Clinton will be the next president of the United States," he said on his radio show Monday, citing a conversation he said a friend of his had with some "Hillary people" who outlined her alleged 2016 campaign plans. Beck said that as he heard the strategy laid out, he thought, "Oh my gosh, she's going to win the presidency."

While the right will be "fighting on Benghazi and everything else," Beck said, "Hillary is going to [say], 'Do you remember when America was good? Do you remember when we had jobs and we were building towards a brighter future, and things were really happening? The Clinton administration, we had it under control."

He continued: "Things were good, and … we're going to do better." Beck said he understood the strength of the strategy because he understood the appeal of the first Clinton administration. "I would so gladly take Bill Clinton right now," he said he's often thought.

Always a heterodox, Beck's take is a different one from the standard conservative line, which is that Clinton is old news. Instead, the pundit said that the potential candidate has a “vision for the future” while the GOP is “all about the past,” with a focus on issues like the Benghazi incident and the IRS scandal.

Beck’s sourcing is, of course, dubious, and Clinton doesn’t have any kind of full-scale political strategy team around her yet. Still, many expect the former first lady, who has said she will decide on a potential 2016 presidential run by the end of this year, to draw on the popularity of her husband’s administration.

The Blaze: “Why Glenn Beck Said Hillary Clinton ‘Will Be the Next President of the United States’”

By Erica Ritz

September 2, 2014, 3:36 p.m. EDT

Glenn Beck said on his radio program Tuesday that “Hillary Clinton will be the next president of the United States.”

Beck said he received information from a friend of his, who is also friends with the “Hillary people,” about Clinton’s campaign strategy in 2016. Beck said that when he heard it, he said, “Oh my gosh, she’s going to win the presidency.”

Beck said Clinton’s “people” told his friend: “The right is so stupid. They just don’t get it. You guys are going to all be fighting on Benghazi and everything else, and here’s what Hillary is going to do. [She is going to say], ‘Do you remember when America was good? Do you remember when we had jobs and we were building towards a brighter future, and things were really happening? The Clinton administration, we had it under control. Things were good, and … we’re going to do better. We’re going to replant our flag in the traditional things that you understand.’”

“And this is what made me say, ‘Oh, my gosh, she’s going to win,’” Beck said. “Pat and I both have said in the past, ‘I would so gladly take Bill Clinton right now. Don’t those years seem simple and good [compared to today]?’”

“And what we will do is play the game of technicality, technicality — all of them valid,” Beck said. “But that’s what it would be viewed as. We already have friends on the left who say, ‘Will you guys just shut up about Benghazi?’ They’ve won that. Same with the IRS. All of it. And while we’re talking about technicalities and the past, they’re going to be talking about a past that was brightly remembered, and they will talk about the America we will become. She will win.”

Beck co-host Stu Burguiere pointed out that Clinton was unable to transmit that vision in 2008.

“She would have done it, had it not been for Barack Obama,” Beck said. “It was the wild card.”

“She had a lot of opportunity, Glenn,” Burguiere said. “And remember, this is the same person who had a 75 percent approval rating as of a year ago, and now that she’s been talking again, she’s down to under 50. As soon as we start hearing from Hillary Clinton, we realize we don’t like Hillary Clinton.”

“Until we start hearing before from John Boehner, Jeb Bush,” Beck responded.

Burguiere agreed: “All the strategy against Jeb Bush, she’ll win by 60 points.”

“There’s no vision,” Beck said of the GOP. “It’s all about the past, past, past. Where is the vision for the future?”

National Journal: "6 Things to Watch When Hillary Heads to Vegas"

By Ben Geman and Jason Plautz

September 3, 2014

Hillary Clinton is about to give her first energy and climate speech of a publicity tour that many believe is the springboard to a presidential campaign.

Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nod if she runs, will be the keynote speaker Thursday at Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid's annual energy conference in Las Vegas.

She's not the only bold-faced name at the event, which includes remarks from Reid, White House adviser John Podesta, and others. But Clinton's speech is sure to be the biggest draw and attract the most scrutiny.

Here what the energy world is watching for:

Will She Split With Obama?

One of the biggest stories of Clinton's summer of media appearances was her criticism of elements of President Obama's foreign policy in an interview with The Atlantic. It's unclear whether any ruptures are in the offing on energy and climate policy. Back when both were running for president in 2008, they split over a gasoline-tax holiday (Clinton favored it, Obama didn't).

More recently, Clinton has praised Obama's carbon regulations for power plants, but energy and climate policy are sprawling topics, so there's plenty of room for differences—eventually.

Do Climate Deniers Get an Olive Branch or a Baseball Bat?

Obama has minced no words of late when he talks about opponents to his climate-change efforts, poking at members of Congress who "stubbornly and automatically reject the scientific evidence about climate change." Clinton has likewise been dismissive of climate deniers, but will she try to strike a more conciliatory stance to keep open the prospect of cooperation with Republican foes?

At a June speech at a Biotechnology Industry Organization conference, Clinton instead went after the media for creating a "false equivalency" by bringing on climate deniers to balance the beliefs of 98 percent of scientists. "It isn't a debate," Clinton said. "The debate is settled. What is not settled is what we're going to do about the debate."

Finessing the Fracking Boom

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The U.S. oil and gas surge is a potential minefield for anyone facing Democratic primaries, even a juggernaut like Clinton. Many environmentalists don't like Obama's "all of the above" mantra that embraces oil and gas drilling. But at the same time, the production boom has given the U.S. more leverage on the global stage when it comes to issues like oil sanctions against Iran and the longer-term possibility of using U.S. gas exports to counter Russia's influence in Europe—topics Clinton understands well.

Clinton, for her part, has praised the natural-gas surge while acknowledging environmental concerns with fracking and methane emissions, calling for "smart regulations." How Clinton addresses oil and gas development, not to mention whether the U.S. should export crude oil, is something to watch this week (if she broaches it) and going forward.

We'll Always Have Paris … to Look Forward To

Clinton devotes a chunk of Hard Choices, her recent State Department memoir, to detailing her and Obama's work at the 2009 United Nations climate summit in Copenhagen, which ultimately produced a voluntary agreement among countries to cut emissions. She's since said that she wants the 2015 U.N. meetings in Paris to net a stronger deal, writing that her hope is for "a new legal agreement on emissions and mitigation that is applicable to every country in the world." Clinton made climate change a focus of her State Department tenure and has talked up the international implications on her book tour, so she'll likely keep the pressure high as leaders prepare for a climate summit in New York this month.

Details or Platitudes?

The crowd of energy executives, environmentalists, and clean-tech insiders at Reid's summit will be hungry for specifics on Clinton's energy plans.

There's plenty to wonder about, like Clinton's take on the future of energy tax credits (beyond the broad-brush support for "targeted incentives" from her recent book) and whether Clinton, who cosponsored cap-and-trade bills as New York senator, would try to push major climate and energy legislation. The plans of a Clinton Environmental Protection Agency are a key topic too, including whether she would push for carbon-emissions rules for sources like refineries and big factories that won't face regulation on Obama's watch.

But the crowd may go home disappointed: There's nothing to stop Clinton from playing it safe by speaking only in broad strokes about the economic benefits of leading in green-energy markets, climate risks, and energy security.

Clinton may be more likely to stray into the world of energy diplomacy. Hard Choices touts formation of the department's Bureau of Energy Resources on her watch. The book counts energy among the topics that must be at the "heart" of American diplomacy. How she applies that idea to hot spots like Ukraine going forward is something that will surface sooner or later on the stump.

Don't Get Your Hopes Up About Keystone

Clinton has so far artfully dodged weighing in on the controversial Alberta-to-Gulf Coast oil-sands pipeline, declining to mention the Keystone XL in her book and sidestepping direct questions about it. Take this answer from a June interview with the Toronto Globe & Mail: "[T]his particular decision is a very difficult one because there are so many factors at play. I can't really comment at great length because I had responsibility for it and it's been passed on and it wouldn't be appropriate, but I hope that Canadians appreciate that the United States government—the Obama administration—is trying to get it right."

It's unlikely that Clinton will break her silence on the pipeline this week, especially since the State Department will weigh in on the pipeline's permit after the November midterms and before her own campaign would start in earnest, giving her some measure of cover.

The Advocate opinion: Kerry Eleveld: "Clinton's New Challenge: The Millennials"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Kerry Eleveld, former Advocate White House reporter

September 3, 2014, 4:00 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Millennials are more progressive on LGBT rights than Hillary was in 2008. Can she inspire them to the polls in a 2016 run?

If there's one thing no one expected, it's that Hillary Clinton would make one of her first campaign missteps over the gays. But there it is. Clinton went after NPR's Fresh Air interviewer Terry Gross in June during a seven-minute exchange about same-sex marriage, DOMA, and whether Clinton had an actual change of heart on marriage equality or simply changed her political calculation as voter attitudes shifted.

Not all seven minutes were a disaster. Clinton lost her cool only in the last minute and a half. It's also not clear that her main offense was substance so much as it was tone, though some publications, such as The Atlantic, argued otherwise. But after Gross tried several times to nail down Clinton's true motivations for changing her marriage position, Clinton's patience waned.

"You know, I have to say, I think you are being very persistent, but you are playing with my words, and playing with what is such an important issue," Clinton said.

Gross pressed gently forward. "I'm just trying to clarify so I can understand — " Then came Clinton's worst moment.

"No, I don't think you are trying to clarify," she charged. "I think you're trying to say I used to be opposed and now I'm in favor and I did it for political reasons. And that's just flat wrong. So let me just state what I feel that you are implying and repudiate it. I have a strong record. I have a great commitment to this issue. And I am proud of what I've done and the progress we're making."

Up to that point, Clinton had played the happy warrior most of the way through the marriage questioning, telling Gross "I think we have all evolved" and "I'm proud of our country."

The interview was sliced and diced and reinterpreted to death by the Beltway media. It was, in fact, interesting to see Clinton stumble on a key issue involving a constituency that has mostly adored her for years. After all, a November 2007 poll by Hunter College found that lesbian, gay, and bisexual likely voters preferred Clinton (63%) over Obama (22%) and Edwards (7%), which roughly corresponds to what 2008 exit polls in New York and California wound up showing.

Most interesting is the media's fascination with Clinton's past positions on LGBT issues — as if this movement's aims are complete and all that remains is to explore the subject in historical terms. Clinton's past is the least interesting part of her positions and probably the least of her worries on same-sex marriage and LGBT issues.

What lies ahead could very well be a marriage case at the Supreme Court in either 2015 or 2016. If people think questions about Clinton's previous stances were thorny, try these: Do you support full marriage equality across the nation? As president, would your administration write an amicus brief supporting the freedom to marry nationwide? Now that ENDA is on the outs, do you support an amendment adding gender identity and sexual orientation to the Civil Rights Act of 1964?

If your only audience is the LGBT community, the answers are easy: Yes to all. But from Clinton's perspective, answering that way on the marriage questions could give a mainstream audience pause. In fact, during her interview with Gross, Clinton reiterated her 2008 stance, saying, "for me, marriage had always been a matter left to the states."

That answer may have worked in 2008 in the shadow of a proposed federal amendment that would have banned same-sex marriage nationwide. But it won't seem appealing to queer rights activists today, and it's uncertain from the interview whether Clinton thinks any differently now than she did then.

The question about the Civil Rights Act, meanwhile, is still gaining traction in the LGBT community and has yet to debut with the broader Democratic base — in particular, African Americans. So just as people wondered in 2008, How do you plan to repeal DADT?, this election cycle they will wonder, How do you plan to secure employment and housing protections for LGBT Americans?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The difference between LGBT issues in 2008 and now is that the answers are less clear-cut. And there isn't complete consensus within the LGBT community on the path forward. Additionally, Clinton isn't yet running amid a pack of other candidates, so she doesn't have the cover of comparisons to her opponents. She is being judged against herself.

In the last contested Democratic presidential campaign, for instance, as early as June 2007, all eight Democratic candidates supported repealing "don't ask, don't tell." And by August 2007, the big three — Hillary Clinton, John Edwards, and Barack Obama — had settled comfortably into a consensus of supporting civil unions, repealing "don't ask, don't tell," passing ENDA, and overturning the Defense of Marriage Act. Trying to differentiate between their policy positions was a matter of splitting hairs. For the candidates, that meant that wooing the LGBT community was largely about outreach and access; it was more tonal than substantive.

Now we're in uncharted territory as the LGBT movement pushes past the remnants of its 2008 issues. And Clinton, for the time being, must confront the dual challenges of tone and substance.

The question now becomes, is it possible for her to be a leader and a candidate at the same time? Candidates typically don't lead. They follow...the polls. They take positions that both they and a majority of the public can feel good about. Then they work on being likable and instilling confidence in their ability to run the country. Obama, for instance, didn't provide a road map to change in 2008; he offered a vehicle — himself — and asked the nation to trust him.

Beyond name recognition, Clinton's head start in 2016 clearly lies in her ability to govern. The only candidate who comes close to matching her grasp of foreign and domestic policy or her 360-degree view of Washington from the White House to Congress to the federal agencies is Vice President Joe Biden. Yet even he doesn't have the benefit of having served as Secretary of State.

But Clinton still needs to inspire people to jump on her bandwagon in the same way Obama did in 2008. And insofar as LGBT issues are concerned in 2016, one of her biggest audiences won't simply be the queer community; it will be millennials who voted for Obama at a rate of 66% in 2008 and 60% in 2012. If Clinton is to re-create Obama's voting blocs in the general election, she needs to win their vote by large margins, but she also needs to inspire them to turn out at the polls in numbers similar to 2008 and 2012, when they made up 18% and 19% of the electorate, respectively.

If Clinton wants to do that, LGBT rights is the place to start. Fully 51% of millennials consider themselves supporters of gay rights, according to the Pew Research Center, as opposed to just 37% of Gen X'ers and about a third of older adults. In fact LGBT rights is one of the most galvanizing issues for millennials. By comparison, 49% describe themselves as patriotic, just 36% as religious, and only 32% as environmentalists. This group matters for Clinton in both the primaries and the general election. In Iowa in 2008, Obama took 57 percent of voters under 30, shocking the Democratic establishment with a win that would fuel his eventual victory.

Though some gays are intent on rehashing the '90s, the millennials likely won't be. They'll be looking for authenticity on the issues of today, as will many LGBT Americans. And while LGBT voters have a long history with Clinton, millennials are still just getting to know her. She needs to give them a reason to go to the polls, and looking like a leader on LGBT issues is one way to do it.

It's unclear that relying on the states' rights fallback on marriage equality is going to fill the bill. And sooner or later, journalists will start asking the marriage question in a way that forces Clinton to choose between states' rights and full federal equality.

Los Angeles Times opinion: Michele Willens, guest blogger: "The question isn't really 'will Hillary Clinton run?' but rather 'can't we do better'?"

By Michele Willens

September 2, 2014, 2:29 p.m. EDT

A significant number of Republican women — 49% — find their party "stuck in the past." That's according to an internal memo from the conservative groups Crossroads GPS and American Action Network that made the rounds last week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This would seem to be the perfect moment, then, for a female presidential candidate of any stripe. The problem is there is only one on the horizon, Hillary Rodham Clinton, who has to overcome a queasiness that polls don't quite know how to measure. Is it a combination of political cynicism, feminist angst, post-menopausal petulance and postponed pride felt by many of us who want to embrace this woman as well as what she represents?

I keep recalling the words of a friend in Massachusetts who said recently, "Every time I get right up to the point of finally liking Hillary, she does something that knocks me right back down again."

I am not alone in my hesitancy to put my arms around Hillary, but neither am I necessarily the norm. Judging by the long lines at the bookstores, there are real fans, or at least many who want to say they shook hands with potential history. So why, when I should be celebrating the possible coronation of one of my own, am I instead filled with conflicting emotions?

- The feminist in me applauds any "mature" woman who lets her years of accomplishment, and lines of experience, speak for themselves. The narcissist in me wishes Hillary would lose 15 pounds and get to the dermatologist.

- The fighter in me is impressed that as secretary of State, she was the toughest one in those White House meetings. The liberal in me wishes she'd lean out when it comes to warfare. And lean in on issues like Ferguson before her consultants calculate it is OK to do it.

- The Ms. in me accepts she has a unique marriage that works. The Mrs. wishes she would draw a few boundaries. (Did he really have to deliver the eulogy for the man who funded all those anti-Clinton programs?)

- The professional in me is envious she is making a zillion dollars an hour for her first-class time. The private citizen in me is offended by her tone-deaf idea of what is fair.

- The boomer in me is thrilled to see an older woman succeed. The realist in me is concerned she would be 69 as she begins the toughest job in the world.

- The historian in me appreciates the commitment of families like the Adamses, the Roosevelts and the Kennedys. The voter in me is really tired of the Clintons.

This all may qualify as one of those white women's problems, but it is entirely possible that Hillary is the lens through which many of us see ourselves.

What really rankles, though, is the Clinton sense of entitlement. For some reason, I think back to a classmate who was elected student body president of Lincoln Junior High in Santa Monica three straight years. I don't remember anyone particularly liking her — she was that girl who got high scores and never once detention —but she made us feel that we should honor her. A friend in Seattle, a longtime Democrat barely getting by as a landlord, summed it up with, "Well, I guess we're stuck with Hillary." That sense of inevitability not only conjures up resentment toward those who always got in, but it also reminds us how many of us felt left out.

Is all this too much to place on one person's shoulders? Of course it is, not to mention asking her to embody an idea whose time has come. Barack Obama did it, but he had an arguably greater personal story, and he was new school. Hillary has paid her dues, stood by her man and devoted most her life to public service. But one thing feminism has taught us is not to settle, and in that spirit, I wonder if others aren't as qualified, including Claire McCaskill and Elizabeth Warren — maybe even someone from the party still "stuck in the past." Hey, maybe my former classmate is available.

Ah well, Hillary is the ultimate survivor, and for that alone, I will likely give her my vote, if not a hug.

Politico: Roger Simon: "Is Mitt Romney really a loser for life?"

By Roger Simon

September 3, 2014, 5:13 a.m. EDT

Unlikely as it might seem, Mitt Romney actually put it best.

"I have looked at what happens to anybody in this country who loses as the nominee of their party," he says. "They become a loser for life."

Here he makes a gesture with his right hand, forming his thumb and index finger into an "L" and holding it up to his forehead as if it were a branding iron.

"We just brutalize whoever loses," Romney says. "I know that. I know that."

This is from the documentary "Mitt," which was released this year and covers Romney's 2008 and 2012 campaigns.

Romney was aware that if he ran for the nomination in 2008 and failed to get it, this would not be fatal. Numerous failed nominees have gone on to get the nomination in future contests.

But if one gets the nomination and then fails to win the presidency, that is a different story.

Republican Thomas Dewey did it, losing in both 1944 and 1948. Democrat Adlai Stevenson did it, losing in both 1952 and 1956. And Richard Nixon did it, losing the presidency in 1960, but winning it in 1968.

But this is ancient history in political terms. In modern times, if you get your party's nomination and then lose the general election, nobody wants to hear from you again.

"Mike Dukakis is mowing lawns," Romney says.

But Romney enters the fray anyway, losing the nomination in 2008, winning the nomination in 2012, but losing the general election.

So Romney should be, by his own analysis, a "loser for life."

But odd things are happening. Republican candidates have been asking him to stump for them in the November elections, and he has been glad to oblige.

A CNN/ORC poll released in late July asked people whom they would vote for if the 2012 election were held again. Romney won by 9 percentage points, 53 percent to 44 percent. (In the actual election, Romney lost by 3.9 percentage points.)

One can dismiss this as typical buyer's remorse: Presidents never quite live up to expectations, and challengers always look better in retrospect. But one senior Republican strategist told me dryly: "I don't remember anyone urging John Kerry to run for president again after he lost."

Is anybody really urging Romney to run again, however?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Iowans seem to like the idea. A recent Suffolk University poll of Iowa caucus-goers showed Romney topping the field with 35 percent and Mike Huckabee an almost invisible second with just 9 percent.

"I'd love to run for president; I loved running for president," Romney told radio talk show host Hugh Hewitt last week. "Had I believed I would actually be best positioned to beat Hillary Clinton, then I would be running."

Romney says, however, that some player to be named later could be a better candidate. "I actually believe that someone new that is not defined yet, someone who perhaps is from the next generation, will be able to catch fire, potentially build a movement and be able to beat Hillary Clinton," Romney said.

Republicans are already looking past their biggest weakness — the current Republican field — to what they believe will be their biggest strength: Hillary Clinton as the standard-bearer for Obama's third term.

"I think Hillary is going to own the Obama record," Stuart Stevens, who was Romney's chief strategist in 2012, told me. "In many ways it looks like 2016 will be a referendum on Obama in the same way 2008 was a referendum on [George W.] Bush."

Which is the race Republicans would like: to bury Hillary's popularity under Obama's unpopularity. But Hillary could upset that strategy by distancing herself from Obama, couldn't she?

Stevens doesn't think so. "When Hillary says something even mildly critical of the Obama administration, the Democratic base erupts with hostility," Stevens said.

Hillary Clinton is no dope, however. She will find a way to distance herself from Obama where she can. But this plays right into the Romney game plan, said one former top Romney aide.

"Hillary Clinton doesn't want to be Barack Obama? Fine," said the aide. "The person who is most not Barack Obama is Mitt Romney. If he decided to run, he'd have a good chance."

Washington Post senior correspondent Dan Balz, author of "Collision 2012: The Future of Election Politics in a Divided America," just released in paperback, said Romney was not a particularly good campaigner in 2012 but "he had some things to say in the campaign that look smarter in retrospect than they did at the time."

Balz says that Romney's campaign statements about Russia being "a geopolitical foe" today looks "more astute than he was given credit for."

But Balz is not predicting that Romney will run in 2016. He said Romney seems "genuinely resistant" to running.

So what could cause Romney to change his mind?

"It could only happen if the field looks weak or if it looks like no one from the establishment wing is getting any traction," Balz said. "One reason there is interest in Romney today is that the 2016 field looks so unsettled."

Romney laid out his own scenario for running. "Let's say all the guys that were running all came together and said, 'Hey, we've decided we can't do it. You must do it,'" Romney said in the interview with Hewitt. "That's the one out of a million we're thinking about."

One out of a million might seem like very long odds to you and me. But what's a million to Mitt Romney?

Politico: "Bill Clinton to raise money for Mary Landrieu"

By Maggie Haberman

September 2, 2014, 2:54 p.m. EDT

Bill Clinton is set to headline a fundraiser for Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu on Saturday, capping a whirlwind week of campaign appearances that will take the former president from the Northeast to the South.

The "save the date" for the Big Easy Committee, a joint fundraising committee between Friends of Mary Landrieu and the Democratic State Central Committee of Louisiana, is for Sept. 6 in New Orleans.

Landreiu is facing a tough reelection battle. Clinton will campaign for her a day after he appears for Florida Democratic gubernatorial hopeful Charlie Crist.

Landrieu was hit last week by a Washington Post report saying she is registered to vote at her parents' home in Louisiana, prompting questions about how much time she spends in Washington versus her home state.

New Haven Register (Conn.): "Bill Clinton rallies party faithful in New Haven event for Gov. Malloy"

By Mary E. O'Leary

September 2, 2014, 4:26 p.m. EDT

Former President Bill Clinton revved up the true believers in a weekday rally putting the onus on them to get a second term for Gov. Dannel P. Malloy.

In a reprise of help he gave Malloy in 2010, Clinton was back in the state, this time in New Haven — a city he knows well, having graduated from Yale Law School in 1973, along with his wife, Hillary Clinton, and U.S. Sen. Richard Blumenthal. Clinton stopped by Katalina's bakery before heading to the Omni New Haven Hotel at Yale.

The 42nd president of the United States said party members only have a few weeks to determine how this tight race turns out, with some polls showing Republican contender Tom Foley pulling ahead.

"The polls ... are based on an assumption that the turnout in a mid-term election will be very different than a turnout in a presidential election. If that happens, shame on us," Clinton said.

The president offered an analogy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Remembering his time in a cottage in Milford more than 40 years ago, he said he would watch as people walked out to a nearby island, but then forgot about the tide.

“I love Connecticut. You have been good to me in personal and political ways. I don’t want you to take your eye off the tides in this election,” Clinton said.

Clinton said based on Malloy’s record, he “should be re-elected by 10 points or more, going away,” which brought cheers from several hundred party regulars, elected officials and campaign staffers in the hourlong pep rally.

“You have a job to do,” he told them again and again.

There were also references to Hillary Clinton and what the next two years mean for her.

Alluding to her expected run for president in 2016, New Haven Mayor Toni Harp welcomed the “homecoming for the first President Clinton.”

Clinton said he was “captivated” by Malloy in 2010, learning how he overcame his personal challenges of dyslexia.

Malloy is an example of a true leader, who will make the hard decisions, Clinton said.

“We want somebody who won’t look at the polls, but will look at the future and think about what is good for the children. ... Are things coming together or being torn apart?” Clinton asked.

“By those tests, this man has more than earned the chance to finish the job he started four years ago,” the former president said, also to cheers from the crowd.

Clinton said a leader has vision, a strategy, executes that strategy and handles “incoming fire.” He said Malloy hits all those targets. He said the Republican mantra is the promise to cut taxes.

“I have been listening to this for over 30 years. They talk tough, but they govern soft,” Clinton said.

The Connecticut Republican Party, in a statement, said the event was “poorly attended.”

“It seems like Bill Clinton can fill any room in the country, unless he’s sharing the stage with Dan Malloy,” said CT GOP spokesman Zak Sanders. “At this point even Democrats can sense that Gov. Malloy is falling far behind, and enthusiasm in his campaign is waning.”

“Dan Malloy has proved that he is willing to do or say whatever it takes to get re-elected and, with desperation setting in, he’s decided to make his campaign about cheap personal attacks instead of the real issues facing our state. Voters know that we need new leadership and a new direction for Connecticut’s future – and that’s why they’re supporting Tom Foley and Heather Somers,” Sanders said.

Clinton said he was the last president to make headway on gun control by passing the Brady Bill, the assault weapons ban and by eliminating ammunition clips. He said he countered the criticism then by pointing out to gun owners that they can still hunt, sport shoot and protect their families.

He said that is the message in Connecticut and added that “you have to have universal background checks, you got to.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton said the agenda of Malloy and Lt. Gov. Nancy Wyman is specific.

"Their opponent basically says they made too many hard decisions, too many people said 'ouch.' 'Vote for me I will make it easy on you. I'm just going to cut everybody's taxes. Hold on, I'll tell you later where we are going to go,'" Clinton said.

Scott McLean, political science professor at Quinnipiac University, said outside surrogates are needed by both campaigns.

"Both Clinton and (New Jersey Gov. Chris) Christie are in our state not only to raise cash, but also to give much-needed charisma transplants to the gubernatorial candidates," McLean said.

"Polls show voters just aren't enthusiastic for either (Tom) Foley or Malloy," McLean said.

The party faithful with tickets paid $50 for the privilege to hear Clinton, while shortly before the rally started a small group of bigger donors met with the president, but there was no comment on how much they raised.

Malloy and Foley have multiple debates scheduled before Nov. 4, while independent expenditure groups are pouring millions into Connecticut for their own ads.

Clinton is in demand as a speaker in a party that fears it will lose control of the U.S. Senate in November.

The elected party leaders took turns praising Malloy and denigrating Foley.

"There are always things we can do better in this state, but I am sick and tired of Tom Foley telling me how terrible my state is. I am sick and tired of the constant incessant daily pessimism that comes out of Republican candidates and at some level, they are living in alternate reality," U.S. Sen. Chris Murphy said.

The senator delivered the harshest criticism of Foley, saying his motivation is to "pad his resume," rather than acting through a passion for governing.

He said Foley's reluctance to expound on his positions "is half political strategy and half indifference."

Murphy said Malloy is "somebody who loves the state and wants to make it even better, versus someone who talks down the state at every opportunity."

Murphy said he was "damn proud" of the boost in the minimum wage and the 60,000 private sector jobs brought on during the administration.

The junior senator said he was happy to be from the state that says it should be the law of the land "that if you are so sick that you can't show up for work, you should be able to stay home for work and still get compensated occasionally for it."

He said during the Clinton years, poverty and unemployment dropped and "all boats were being lifted," a model for states.

Not to dampen the achievements of Clinton, Murphy said unemployment nationally dropped by 2 percentage points in four years' time. Under Malloy, it is down almost 3 percentage points in the same timeframe, Murphy said. It was 9.3 percent in 2011 and is now 6.6 percent.

The message from all the speakers was that Malloy has a "great story to tell," as they listed a dip in crime and a start on universal pre-kindergarten and he challenged the Republican candidate to match Malloy's record.

"Are you ready to go out and tell the story to the people of Connecticut?" Murphy asked.

Blumenthal and Wyman continued the analogies between Clinton and Malloy.

All of them emphasized the strict gun reform bill adopted in April 2013 in the wake of the killing of 20 first-graders and six educators in Newtown in December 2012 that has become a point of contention with Foley.

Murphy called it Malloy's "deepest" achievement, while the governor characterized it as "great."

He said it has been a tough four years given Newtown, the economy and the numerous devastating storms.

Malloy described Foley as a "guy who prays for rain on a sunny day. This is the guy who purchased a seat in the cheap section and has been making cheap shots ever since the last election was over. He actually feels that he is entitled to be the governor of the state of Connecticut."

"I got news for you, you run to be the governor of the state of Connecticut," he said.

Continuing the theme of a negative picture of Connectiuct, Malloy said, "You don't put down the state I was born in."

He predicted Foley will cut funding to schools and cut funding to towns so there will be municipal cuts, based on his tax and budget proposals.

Foley, however, has said he would not do either, but he hasn't said where he would cut as he holds funding flat for two years with a projected $1.4 billion deficit in fiscal 2016. He wants to eliminate the business entity tax and cut the sales tax from 6.35 percent to 5.85 percent.

Malloy said Foley would "stack the pardons and parole board to do what he wants done" on gun control.

"This is worth having a fight over. We have to make the people of Connecticut as safe as we possibly can and that is what we will do," Malloy said.

The gun issue is expected to play a part in the election with the 15,000-member Connecticut Citizens Defense League endorsing Foley.

Foley disagrees with the punishment for not registering the weapons that have been added to the greatly expanded list of banned firearms. He has said he would recommend to the state's attorney that he not prosecute violators and he would impact the law by the people he names to the pardon board.

Malloy said Foley will end up cutting jobs just like he did at the Bibb Co. when he ran it in the 1990s. The Democrats continue to hammer him on Bibb, something they also did in 2010 when Malloy ran against him the first time.

Foley has said he added 3,000 jobs at Bibb before it went into bankruptcy under his management. It closed after it was sold.

"He is not a job creator, he is a job destroyer," Malloy said.

In a quick press conference after the event, Malloy asked Foley where he would have cut in 2010 faced with the $3.6 billion deficit.

BuzzFeed: "What Exactly Is Amy Klobuchar Up To?"

By Kate Nocera

September 2, 2014, 10:04 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] The relatively unknown Minnesota Democrat has been all over the country this year.

A few weeks ago at a Washington cocktail party, Sen. Amy Klobuchar was chatting with someone who asked why she was going to Iowa again.

"I was invited!" Klobuchar insisted, laughing, an attendee who heard the conversation recalled.

The Democratic Senator is being invited a lot of places these days — which is surprising considering her name I.D. outside of her home state of Minnesota isn't exactly sky high. Klobuchar has crisscrossed the country in the last few months, keynoting Democratic Party Dinners, fundraising for Senate candidates (her PAC has maxed out to several candidates), and building up her profile with the party base. She's toured a popcorn store with Bruce Braley in Iowa, co-chaired an economic roundtable with Jeanne Shaheen in New Hampshire, and spoke at the Sanford Hunt Frye in North Carolina on behalf of Sen. Kay Hagan. All told, Klobuchar has traveled to more than 10 states this cycle.

Furious travel schedules like these are usually meant to do one thing: produce a big spike in a politician's influence.

One Democratic operative compared Klobuchar's 2014 to what Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand has done in recent cycles.

"Gillibrand had a little bit more of a profile — she was starting at a slightly higher base than Amy does," the operative said. "Gillibrand was using her 'off the sidelines' project to build a national base and now she is, if not a household name, a Democratic base-hold name and I think Amy wants to do the same thing."

Like Gillibrand, Klobuchar maintains the relentless campaigning is in service of a bigger goal: electing more Democratic women to the Senate.

"I've gone this around the country a lot because we don't have that many women in the Senate, though about a year ago we had a traffic jam in the women's bathroom for the first time in history," the senator said in an interview. "So I've been helping them. It goes back to when I headed up the women's Senate network for the last two cycles of the [Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee]."

Klobuchar has been deeply involved with Emily's List, a group that works to help elect women supportive of abortion rights. She co-chairs the group's "impact series" — quartly events that highlight the work of women supported by Emily's List are doing in Congress. During the 2012 cycle, when Klobuchar was up for re-election and doing well, she worked in both Wisconsin and North Dakota to help with the elections of Tammy Baldwin and Heidi Heitkamp.

She went to Georgia to help Michelle Nunn this time around — a weird place for a progressive midwestern senator. What does a Minnesota senator have in common with the voters of Georgia? A lot if you ask Klobuchar, who argued Georgia and Minnesota are more alike than different in terms of their business and farming communities.

That trip speaks to a core reason for Klobuchar's schedule: no one would be inviting her anywhere if they thought she wasn't any good. Operatives describe Klobuchar as approachable and likeable on the stump.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“People may not know who she is, but they walk away from her liking her and understanding her message,” said a campaign staffer for one Democratic candidate in a tight race.

And while Klobuchar’s certainly cognizant of the big priority (keeping the Senate in Democratic hands), the progressive senator emphasized the importance of moderate, red state Democrats in the Senate.

“A lot of it is trying to elect good people trying to move the country forward and not just stand in corners of the boxing ring,” she said. “For me that’s very, very important. The majority people that are up would be considered moderate Democrats and they do try and find common ground.”

“They are people that want to get things done for the country and that’s why this election to me is so important and of course getting these women elected, knowing how fragile this is,” she continued. “We lose them, we lose a good part of the women in the Senate.”

Klobuchar ticked off the accomplishments of her female colleagues this past congress: Patty Murray’s work on the budget negotiations, Debbie Stabenow’s work on the farm bill, Barbara Mikulski’s work as appropriations chairwoman.

She left herself off the list. But, like Gillibrand, she’s likely got some next thing in mind.

“Every one of these senators thinks that he or she can be the next president of the United States,” said Jim Manley, a Democratic strategist and Harry Reid’s former communications director. “Clearly she has ambitions; I don’t know what they are right now. Is she building chips in the caucus as she moves up the ladder in the Senate or is it broader than that? I just can’t tell.”

The Daily Beast: “Gail Sheehy Books Passage to the Past”

By Lizzie Crocker

September 3, 2014

[Subtitle:] The legendary journalist and ‘Passages’ author talks about her new memoir, the glory days of the new journalism, and the denizens of Grey Gardens.

In the summer of 1971, reporter Gail Sheehy fled Manhattan every weekend for East Hampton, seeking an escape from what had become a six-month investigation into prostitution in New York City. But instead of tending to her verdant tomato garden, Sheehy found herself drawn down the road to Grey Gardens, a decaying mansion overrun by howling cats and home to Big Edie and Little Edie Beale, dotty and reclusive relatives of former first lady Jacqueline Bouvier Kennedy.

Just a few miles away and 43 summers later, Sheehy sits in a Sag Harbor rental cottage and reflects on “The Secrets of Grey Gardens,” her now-infamous New York magazine cover story about the Beales, outcasts from the wealthy WASP culture that was their birthright. “WASPs are like the Alawites of America, a rare breed,” says the now 70-year-old Sheehy. Looking youthful in jeans and a turquoise linen t-shirt, a helmet of red hair framing her animated face, she is diminutive, quick-witted, and disarmingly warm. (She addresses me in various terms of endearment, as one would an old friend, and invites me to swim in her pool after lunch). It’s a quality that surely worked to her advantage while interviewing the Beales.

“Oh God, that was so much fun,” Sheehy says, wedging a cookie between two heaping scoops of ice cream—dessert. “It was one of my favorite stories, not only because of the characters but because it was a social history, going back to the grandfather who was a paterfamilias and managed everybody’s lives and then cut them all off as heirs. And the Kennedy’s were in the White House!”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It was one of Sheehy's breakout pieces of "new journalism," establishing her as a worthy contemporary of writers like Tom Wolfe, Hunter Thompson, and Joan Didion. As a pioneering female journalist in the '60s and '70s, she covered everything from the culture wars—with particular focus on feminism and the sexual revolution—to the emerging civil war in Northern Ireland. Between 1968 and 1977, she would file more than 50 stories for New York magazine. She's since written 17 books, including the best-selling Passages, which the Library of Congress declared one of the most influential books of our time; blurring the boundaries between self-help and pop psychology, the book was embraced—particularly by American women—as a new way of thinking about adulthood and its accompanying crises. It also established Sheehy as a celebrity author and household name (she milked its success in four subsequent books that were all variations on the Passages theme).

In Daring: My Passages, Sheehy now chronicles the ups and downs of her own life, from the fallout of divorce and single motherhood in her late '20s to her sudden and dizzying success in her '30s, and a life-changing second marriage in her late '40s.

Much of Daring is a tribute to Sheehy's second husband, the late New York magazine founding editor Clay Felker, and the narrative style of the "new journalism movement" that he tirelessly promoted. (The movement's stars—like Wolfe and Gay Talese—were among the original members of the New York family, many of whom Felker brought with him from the New York Herald Tribune.) Sheehy recalls fondly the excitement of writing social commentary in the '60s and '70s, two decades that "spawned more new lifestyles than could be contained in any magazine." While radical activists were attempting to change society, New York and its stable of writers were permanently altering the direction of journalism. "Only in retrospect did we appreciate our good fortune in being part of a utopian experiment in American journalism," she writes. "At the time, we were too busy having fun."

In Sag Harbor, Sheehy breathlessly recalls the staff feeding off each other's ideas during weekly editorial lunches. "There was this incredible cross-fertilization at the table. We'd be there for two hours and get so hyped that we would literally run out of the meeting to start doing our research."

She remembers how the small staff of Felker's fledgling magazine would gather at The Palm near the United Nations building, which played host to journalists, dignitaries, and future presidents. "George H.W. Bush was our representative to the U.N. [at the time] and would always be at a table in the corner, late, and with a different girlfriend every time," she says, grinning.

It was an auspicious time to be a reporter, especially as a Columbia Journalism School student studying under cultural anthropologist Margaret Mead. "You had the Black Panthers scaring the shit out of the white radicals, who were desperately trying to compete," she says of the privileged white students who fancied themselves revolutionaries. "And then you had the early feminists who were making their young husbands shrivel up because they could never do anything right."

"The earliest [feminists] were the most extreme: the radical redstockings and the Ti-Grace Atkinsons. They were really hard-nosed. And that was before Gloria [Steinem] got into it, too. I was writing about it early on, but I was writing about it in a somewhat satirical way. Because that was sort of the safe way, and it was fun to make fun of it." But Sheehy wanted to be taken seriously by her feminist colleagues, particularly Steinem, who was fast becoming a leader in the movement. (In 2013, Sheehy wrote about the survival of "the feminist spirit" for The Daily Beast).

But Daring is more than just a personal memoir; it's a fast-paced romp through the second half of the 20th century, told through the prism of stories that shaped Sheehy's career: her first political piece on Bobby Kennedy's presidential campaign in California; an award-winning series on prostitutes and their pimps; a brush with death in Northern Ireland on Bloody Sunday, which was the impetus for writing Passages; the forgotten Cambodian refugee children who survived Pol Pot's genocide; profiles of political figures like Margaret Thatcher, George H.W. Bush, and Hillary Clinton.

Her political writings weren't received without controversy. When Sheehy's biography of the former First Lady came out in 1999, the Clintons went into attack mode. "Hillary had [Clinton aide] Sidney Blumenthal call people before my book came out, trashing it," she says. "They are vicious when it comes to trying to silence anyone who has been critical of them." But she nevertheless declares herself to be sympathetic to the former secretary of state. "I don't find her to be particularly likeable, but I am a great admirer and I always like to see her succeed."

At the heart of Daring is Sheehy's Pygmalion-like romance with her mentor, editor, and husband, Clay Felker. But she acknowledges that their partnership wasn't always romantic. "It was a creative intimacy from the very beginning," she explains. Over time, their potent mentor-mentee relationship evolved into a passionate on-again, off-again love affair. But it was intellectual ferment that Sheehy craved above all else. "When we lived together, the most fun we had was reading the papers in the morning over breakfast, digesting the world and spitting it out and arguing about it."

Like Sheehy, Felker had also been previously married and they were both leery of commitment. Sheehy was in her mid-thirties when she broke off the relationship.

“I thought that was the most daring decision of my life,” she remembers. “Because I loved him and didn’t want to lose him. And it could have gone wrong. But I knew I had to strike out on my own and prove myself without a mentor.”

Sheehy reunited with Felker after she finished Passages, which sat on the New York Times bestseller list for three whole years. The two were married in 1984, 22 years after they first met, and remained so until Felker’s death in 2008.

Today, Sheehy is a poster girl for young female journalists: a dogged reporter who seduced wary subjects by charming her way past their defenses and then winning their confidence—pretty much the same way she disarmed this intimidated protégé.

As she gears up for a publicity tour on her most personal work, Sheehy says she’s more emotionally equipped than ever before to dodge the slings and arrows that come with promoting a book.

“I’ve had the experience of having a book praised but then it doesn’t sell. Or not praised but then it sells. Every combination you can think of, so I guess I’m sort of bulletproof at this point.”

She pauses, laughing at herself.

“Well, not really.”

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Speech on Energy Houston, TX 06/17/08

Hello Big Campaign,

Just off the phone with our tracker Jacob, who is on the ground in Houston. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- McCain flubs: "with gas running at $4 a barrel-- a gallon," jokes that he wishes it were the good old days like that
- Links Obama to Jimmy Carter: "I like recycling but it's better applied to paper and plastic than the failed policies of the 60s and 70s"
- Says the next President must be willing to break policies not just with the current Administration but the ones that came before it
- Says offshore drilling is now safe enough that even Hurricanes Rita and Katrina couldn't cause spillage
- Promises a series of talks on energy in the weeks ahead
- Says we need to look beyond special interests and pursue policies that are good for both parties
- Says some tasks will be the work of decades, some of years; they will all begin in the term of the next President
- Continues to promote nuclear energy
- McCain Campaign advisor and former lobbyist, Charlie Black in attendance

Houston, TX: McCain Speech on Energy 06/17/08

Background Details:
- Tracker had no problem getting into event
- Charlie Black in attendance -- we got footage of him standing off to the side, lurking in the shadows
- Even located in a giant ballroom (Apprx 1000 capacity); Room cut in half by press risers
- Audience in the front half – aprx 300 out of 1000 person capacity in attendance
- Audience enthusiastic, more so than normal
- Event had a rotary club feel: white people, and business attire
- Press turnout was fairly good– but no notables; Houston Chronicle, local networks, KPFT
- Little stagecraft – American and Texas Flags – no campaign signs except for Reform, Prosperity, and Peace on the podium and the audience had no signs,
- Advance staff handed out campaign press release
- Texas Senator introduced Texas Governor, Rick Perry
- Texas Governor, Rick Perry introduced McCain

Speech Excerpts:
Excerpts From Remarks As Prepared For Delivery Houston, TX June 17, 2008

…Among its other distinctions, this great city is known as the oil capital of America. But people in Houston and all of Texas understand as well as anyone that the high price of oil and gas today is causing great harm all across our economy. People are hurting — small farmers, truckers, and taxi drivers unable to cover their costs, small business owners struggling to meet payroll, the cost of living rising and the value of paychecks falling. All of this, in large part, because the price of oil is too high, and the supply of oil too uncertain. These citizens believe their government has a duty to finally assure the energy security of this country, and they are right.

I first addressed this issue at the outset of my primary campaign. And in just that time – a little more than a year – the price of a barrel of oil has more than doubled. And the price of a gallon of gas in America stands at more than four dollars. Yesterday, a barrel of oil cost about 134 dollars. And various oil ministers and investment firms have confidently informed us that soon we can expect to pay 200 dollars for every barrel, and as much as seven dollars for every gallon of gas.…

Somehow the United States – in so many ways the most self-reliant of nations – has allowed and at times even encouraged this state of affairs. This was a troubling situation 35 years ago. It was an alarming situation twenty years ago. It is a dangerous situation today. And starting in the term of the next president, we must take control over our own energy future, and become once again the master of our fate.

The next president must be willing to break with the energy policies not just of the current Administration, but the administrations that preceded it, and lead a great national campaign to achieve energy security for America. So in the days ahead I plan to return to the subject in a series of discussions to explain my reform agenda. And I will set forth a strategy to free America once and for all from our strategic dependence on foreign oil.…Among these is a challenge we hardly even understood back when America first learned to associate the word "energy" with "crisis." We now know that fossil fuel emissions, by retaining heat within the atmosphere, threaten disastrous changes in climate. No challenge of energy is to be taken lightly, and least of all the need to avoid the consequences of global warming.

In the face of climate change and other serious challenges, energy conservation is no longer just a moral luxury or a personal virtue. Conservation serves a critical national goal. Over time, we must shift our entire energy economy toward a sustainable mix of new and cleaner power sources. This will include some we use already, such as wind, solar, biofuels, and other sources yet to be invented. It will include a variety of new automotive and fuel technologies — clean-burning coal and nuclear energy — and a new system of incentives, under a cap-and-trade policy, to put the power of the market on the side of environmental protection.

But to make the great turn away from carbon-emitting fuels, we will need all the inventive genius of which America is capable. We will need as well an economy strong enough to support our nation's great shift toward clean energy. And this gives us only further incentive to protect ourselves from the sudden shocks and ever-rising prices that come with our dependence on foreign oil.

Up to a point, these sudden rises in the price of oil are explainable in the terms of basic economics. When demand exceeds supply, prices always rise, and this has happened very dramatically in the demand for oil. Two powerful forces in the oil market today are China and India, nations in which a third of humanity is suddenly entering the industrial era – with all the cars, construction, and consumption of oil that involves.

There is the further problem of speculation on the oil futures market, which in many cases has nothing to do with the actual sale, purchase, or delivery of oil. When crude oil became a futures-traded commodity in the 1980's, the idea was to afford a measure of protection against the historic volatility of oil pricing. It takes several weeks to ship oil from the Arabian Peninsula to the offshore port of Louisiana. And for the buyers, it helps to know that the price will not suddenly fall while the oil is in transit. A futures contract assures importers that they can sell the oil at a profit.

That's the theory, anyway. But we all know that some people on Wall Street are not above gaming the system. When you have enough speculators betting on the rising price of oil, that itself can cause oil prices to keep on rising. And while a few reckless speculators are counting their paper profits, most Americans are coming up on the short end – using more and more of their hard-earned paychecks to buy gas for the truck, tractor, or family car.

Investigation is underway to root out this kind of reckless wagering, unrelated to any kind of productive commerce, because it can distort the market, drive prices beyond rational limits, and put the investments and pensions of millions of Americans at risk. Where we find such abuses, they need to be swiftly punished. And to make sure it never happens again, we must reform the laws and regulations governing the oil futures market, so that they are just as clear and effective as the rules applied to stocks, bonds, and other financial instruments. In all of these markets, reform must assure transparency, prevent abuse, and protect the public interest.…

At the time of OPEC's oil embargo, we imported roughly a third of our oil. Now we import two thirds. At that time, every day, we produced more than nine million barrels of oil domestically. Now America produces five million barrels a day. Five million barrels sounds like a lot until we compare the number with the oil we use, which comes to 20 million barrels, or a quarter of all the oil used every day across the earth.…

It takes a very short leap in logic to wonder why we produce less and less crude oil, while we use more and more of it, or why politicians talk so much about promoting alternative energy sources, but often do so little to promote these alternatives. A reasonable observer, presented only with these numbers of consumption and production, might draw the conclusion that America has accepted this fate because we have no choice in the matter, or because we have no resources of our own. But just the opposite is true: We do have resources, and we do have a choice.

In oil, gas, and coal deposits, we have enormous energy reserves of our own. And we are gaining the means to use these resources in cleaner, more responsible ways. As for offshore drilling, it's safe enough these days that not even Hurricanes Katrina and Rita could cause significant spillage from the battered rigs off the coasts of New Orleans and Houston. Yet for reasons that become less convincing with every rise in the price of foreign oil, the federal government discourages offshore production.

At the very least, one might assume, America had surely been building new refineries to achieve a more efficient delivery of gasoline to market, and thereby to lower the prices paid by the American people – especially in the summer season. But the policymakers in Washington haven't got around to that, either. There's so much regulation of the industry that the last American refinery was built when Jerry Ford was president.

As for nuclear energy – a proven energy source that requires zero emissions – we haven't built a new reactor in 31 years. In Europe and elsewhere, they have been expanding their use of nuclear energy. But we've waited so long that we've lost our domestic capability to even build these power plants. Nuclear power is among the surest ways to gain a clean, abundant, and stable energy supply, as other nations understand. One nation today has plans to build almost 50 new reactors by 2020. Another country plans to build 26 major nuclear stations. A third nation plans to build enough nuclear plants to meet one quarter of all the electricity needs of its people – a population of more than a billion people. Those three countries are China, Russia, and India. And if they have the vision to set and carry out great goals in energy policy, then why don't we?

So, taking stock of our energy situation, it is time we draw a few sensible conclusions of our own. In their sum effect on the American economy, the policies of our government could hardly have left us more dependent had they been designed to do precisely that. This vulnerability is clear in many ways, and never more than when American leaders are reduced to supplicating for lower prices before the sheiks and princes of OPEC. Of course, they are unmoved by our troubles. They regard even the need to ask as a sign of weakness. And in the end, they take their cues not from our entreaties for relief, but from our failure to diversify and to produce.

Quite rightly, I believe, we confer a special status on some areas of our country that are best left undisturbed. When America set aside the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, we called it a "refuge" for a reason.

But the stakes are high for our citizens and for our economy. And with gasoline running at more than four bucks a gallon, many do not have the luxury of waiting on the far-off plans of futurists and politicians. We have proven oil reserves of at least 21 billion barrels in the United States. But a broad federal moratorium stands in the way of energy exploration and production. And I believe it is time for the federal government to lift these restrictions and to put our own reserves to use.

We can do this in ways that are consistent with sensible standards of environmental protection. And in states that choose to permit exploration, there must be an appropriate sharing of benefits between federal and state governments. But as a matter of fairness to the American people, and a matter of duty for our government, we must deal with the here and now, and assure affordable fuel for America by increasing domestic production.

We should set the highest goals for ourselves for the years and decades to come, and I am a believer in the technologies that one day will free us from oil entirely. But to get there at all, a more pragmatic approach will serve us better. In the short term, we must take the world as it is and our resources where they are – even as we press on with new and cleaner sources of energy. We must be bold in our plans to break our strategic dependence on oil, and over the next two weeks, I'll be offering a vision that will be bold. But we must also address the concerns of Americans, who are struggling right now to pay for gasoline, groceries, and other necessities of life.

What is certain in energy policy is that we have learned a few clear lessons along the way. Somehow all of them seem to have escaped my opponent. He says that high oil prices are not the problem, but only that they rose too quickly. He's doesn't support new domestic production. He doesn't support new nuclear plants. He doesn't support more traditional use of coal, either.

So what does Senator Obama support in energy policy? Well, for starters he supported the energy bill of 2005 – a grab-bag of corporate favors that I opposed. And now he supports new taxes on energy producers. He wants a windfall profits tax on oil, to go along with the new taxes he also plans for coal and natural gas. If the plan sounds familiar, it's because that was President Jimmy Carter's big idea too – and a lot of good it did us. Now as then, all a windfall profits tax will accomplish is to increase our dependence on foreign oil, and hinder exactly the kind of domestic exploration and production we need. I'm all for recycling – but it's better applied to paper and plastic than to the failed policies of the 1970's.Oddly enough, though, Senator Obama doesn't want to lower the gas taxes paid by consumers, which would be the most direct and obvious way to give Americans a break at the gas station. Even in tough times for our economy, when folks are struggling to pay for gas and groceries, tax relief just isn't change he can believe in.

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA:

— It's fight night in Las Vegas. Republican presidential candidates will debate for the fifth and final time of 2015 on CNN. The undercard debate, featuring four low-polling candidates, starts at 6 p.m. Eastern and the main event begins at 9 p.m. Though, to gin up ratings and advertising revenue, CNN annoyingly keeps hinting that it could start closer to 8:30.

If you want to optimize your debate-viewing experience tonight, definitely keep The Post's live blog open on your browser tonight. As always, we're flooding the zone. We deployed six political reporters and two editors to the venue in Vegas, not to mention videographers, producers and columnists. We're also excited because this is the first debate night in our brand new office on K Street, where a team of fact checkers is standing by to hold the candidates accountable for their inevitable misstatements and embellishments. You can follow our live blog here.

— What are the pros watching for? I checked in with my colleagues on the politics team about what they're following tonight.

Dan Balz, our chief correspondent, sums it up: "You have a national frontrunner in Donald Trump but you have Ted Cruz now as the person rising rapidly in Iowa and potentially poised to deliver the first setback to Trump. That, along with Cruz's closed-door criticism of Trump last week, makes for a pretty compelling dynamic for tonight's debate. But think of the other potential face-offs beyond Trump v Cruz. There's Christie v Trump; Rubio v Cruz; Cruz v Paul; Rubio v Trump; and Bush v you name it. But in many ways it's still Trump v the field. Who has the most at stake tonight? Probably Cruz, Christie and Rubio."

–The attacks in Paris and San Bernardino happened since the last debate five weeks ago, making terrorism extra salient .

- Matea Gold wonders: "Who emerges as the strongest and most credible voice on national security? I'm interested in seeing whether any of the candidates will manage to address the fear among Americans of another attack while also conveying calm and optimism. Or do they seek to ramp up the unease?"
- Karen Tumulty thinks we'll see a substantive debate play out about how to balance security and civil liberties: "The media and pundit class focus is going to be on verbal sparring and one-liners, but if you listen carefully, you are likely to hear deeper, and more substantive differences among the candidates on the basic question of America's role in a world that many of its citizens find to be a scarier and scarier place these days. Everyone will agree on the need to destroy ISIS, but the candidates part ways on the question of when and where and how the United States should use its military, as well as other tools of foreign policy. We are seeing deeper differences among the GOP candidates this cycle on those choices than we have in the past."

–Trump is a wild card:

- "Here's the dirty little secret of the Republican race: Donald Trump is a bad debater," writes Chris Cillizza. "In the first four debates, he's seemed bored, distracted, poorly briefed and, well, a little behind the times. And, as Philip Bump wrote on The Fix today, he's dipped in the polls after each of the debates. It hasn't mattered much so far — Trump is as high as he has ever been — but it doesn't change the fact that he's been a bad debater. I'm interested to see if he has practiced or worked on it at all since the last one. Probably not, knowing him. But he'd be smart to recognize that debating is a major weakness for him in this race."
- Editor Amy Gardner wonders how Trump will handle a question about slipping in Iowa polling: "He's no longer unequivocally on top, and the world will be watching to see how he deals with that."
- Jenna Johnson, who has been traveling with The Donald, wonders what the other candidates will say about blocking Muslims from entering the U.S. since fresh polling shows most GOP primary voters support it. "The expectation is that this will be the debate where GOP establishment candidates like Jeb Bush, John Kasich and Chris Christie will go after Trump on policy issues and present themselves as more qualified, prepared, serious candidates — but they do so at their own peril, as attacking Trump comes with the risk that it will only strengthen his popularity and support. … I'm interested to see if the other candidates use this as an opportunity to go after Trump or if they just leave the (Muslim) issue alone. In the past few debates, Trump has largely refrained from attacking his opponents unless directly attacked first — and it will be interesting to see if that continues tonight."

- Remember: In the last debate when everyone thought Trump would go after Ben Carson during the debate, and he did not. It's always possible he could take a pass on going after Cruz, messing up a lot of the b-matter that's been written ahead of time.

Ted Cruz and Donald Trump at their joint rally against the Iran nuclear deal in September. (Reuters/Jonathan Ernst)

—How does Cruz deal with attacks from Trump and his newfound status as Iowa frontrunner? "So far this month, as Cruz's rise in the polls has picked up steam, Trump's made the relatively quick journey from delivering offhand, somewhat-unenthusiastic Cruz compliments, to delivering Cruz insults disguised as compliments, to delivering Cruz insults that look like insults," writes editor Rebecca Sinderbrand. "Meanwhile, the Texas senator has made a slower, parallel journey of his own."

- "Trump tends to try out a few lines of attack until he finds one that sticks — and he's floated at least half a dozen Cruz hits this week alone. So far, they've fallen into a few main categories: attacks that paint Cruz as a phony; attacks that paint him as a corrupt phony; and attacks that paint him as a possibly emotional, definitely sycophantic beta male … Cruz won't want to let the beta male charge — the > Trump claim that he'll agree with anything that comes out of the billionaire's mouth — go unanswered, even as he won't want to get sucked into an angry on-stage moment. So it's possible the question tonight may be less whether he pushes back at Trump than how. The counteroffensive strategies [Cruz] uses on stage tonight will provide a preview of how he's likely to handle the challenge on his upcoming dozen-state blitz."

— Katie Zezima, who covers the Texas senator's campaign, will also be monitoring the Cruz v Rubio dynamic: "Will he go after Rubio on policy, as he has been doing, and ignore what will likely be an inevitable attack from Trump? Cruz can't cut to a clip from 'Flashdance' – as his campaign tweeted out when Trump called him a 'maniac' – while standing on the debate stage. Cruz's team has said they will only respond to substantive attacks (ones on policy), and it will be interesting to see what Cruz sees as the substance threshold when it comes to Trump."

— "Republican voters are angry. Marco Rubio wants them to know that he gets it and feels it," writes Sean Sullivan, who is covering the Florida senator's campaign. "Easier said than done at a time when Trump and Cruz have excelled at that better than anyone else in the field. At a campaign rally and in a new TV commercial on Monday, Rubio's message was that there is plenty of reason to be upset about the direction of country and that he holds the key to turning things around. But campaigns are not run in a vacuum. A big question for Rubio tonight is whether he can punch that point standing a few feet away from Trump and Cruz."

— Ed O'Keefe is curious to see how Christie takes advantage of his return to the primetime stage and whether Jeb can create a moment. "Bush now mocks debates as 'performances' – by that measure, his performance has improved over the course of the debate process," Ed writes. "But is there anything he can do tonight to stand out – and make a brief standout moment stick in the minds of voters?"

–How does Rand Paul staying on the main stage change the dynamic? "Everybody knows that Rand got into this debate like Indiana Jones rolling out of a cave before the trap door slams," quips David Weigel. "It was close. In Las Vegas, it's even sort of an in-joke: Organizers for the "undercard" debate had grudgingly expected Paul to push his way back into prime time at the last minute, saving his campaign but punishing their ratings and drama.

- "Had Paul missed the debate, Cruz might have been able to establish himself as the most electable candidate for the 'libertarian lane' of Republican voters," Weigel adds. "I saw him do as much yesterday at the Nevada National Security Summit, where (via video) he defined himself between the left that responds to terror with gun control bills, and the right that responds with calls for more NSA surveillance. Cruz can still try this, but I am watching to see how Paul accentuates the differences between them on privacy and national security. He is completely confident that he can out-argue Rubio and Christie on those topics; whether or not the reality comports with that, I expect him to try.
- "At the same time, I expect Cruz to take none of the bait tossed his way by Paul or Trump. Cruz is better-liked among many voters who support both of those candidates, and accordingly he can pivot from any attack to his preferred message, looking gracious not week."

Ben Carson speaks in Michigan last week. (David Guralnick/Detroit News via AP)

— Can Carson force his way back into the conversation? "The retired neurosurgeon has seen his poll numbers dramatically decline in the last month, falling from second place (just behind Trump) to tying for third or fourth in most national polls," notes Jose DelReal, who has been traveling with him. "The primary driver: the Paris and San Bernardino attacks, which have made national security the top issue … The retired neurosurgeon has tried to close his foreign policy credibility gap in town halls and rallies around the country, talking about visiting two refugee camps in Jordan and announcing a foreign policy team last week. On the stump, he now regularly references several geopolitically significant sites while talking about terrorism: Raqqa, Syria; Sinjar, Iraq; and Mosul, Iraq. Carson has received poll bumps after the last several debates, moving huge social media numbers even as critics have failed to detect any breakout moments. Whether he invites similar results after this debate will heavily depend on whether he can reassure voters he would be fit to keep the nation safe."

OMNIBUS UPDATE FROM CAPITOL HILL:

Lawmakers are still working this evening to complete a $1.1 trillion spending and tax package to fund the government through September 2016.

- House Republicans have scheduled a meeting at 9 p.m. tonight to discuss the status of the talks.
- Harry Reid says the deal is being held up because of disagreements over a plan to lift the 40-year ban on oil exports and proposed changes to the Child Tax Credit, Kelsey Snell relays . "Republican leaders have not accepted a request from Democrats to increase tax breaks for renewable energy producers in exchange for agreeing to lift the oil export ban." But they're also arguing about GOP demands to limit fraud in the tax credit program that Democrats believe would negatively affect low-income workers. Ocean conservation is also being debated.
- If there's a deal, the House is expected to go first, voting late Thursday. Senate Republicans will meet tomorrow discuss it.
- Lawmakers will need to pass another short-term funding bill to prevent the government from shutting down tomorrow.

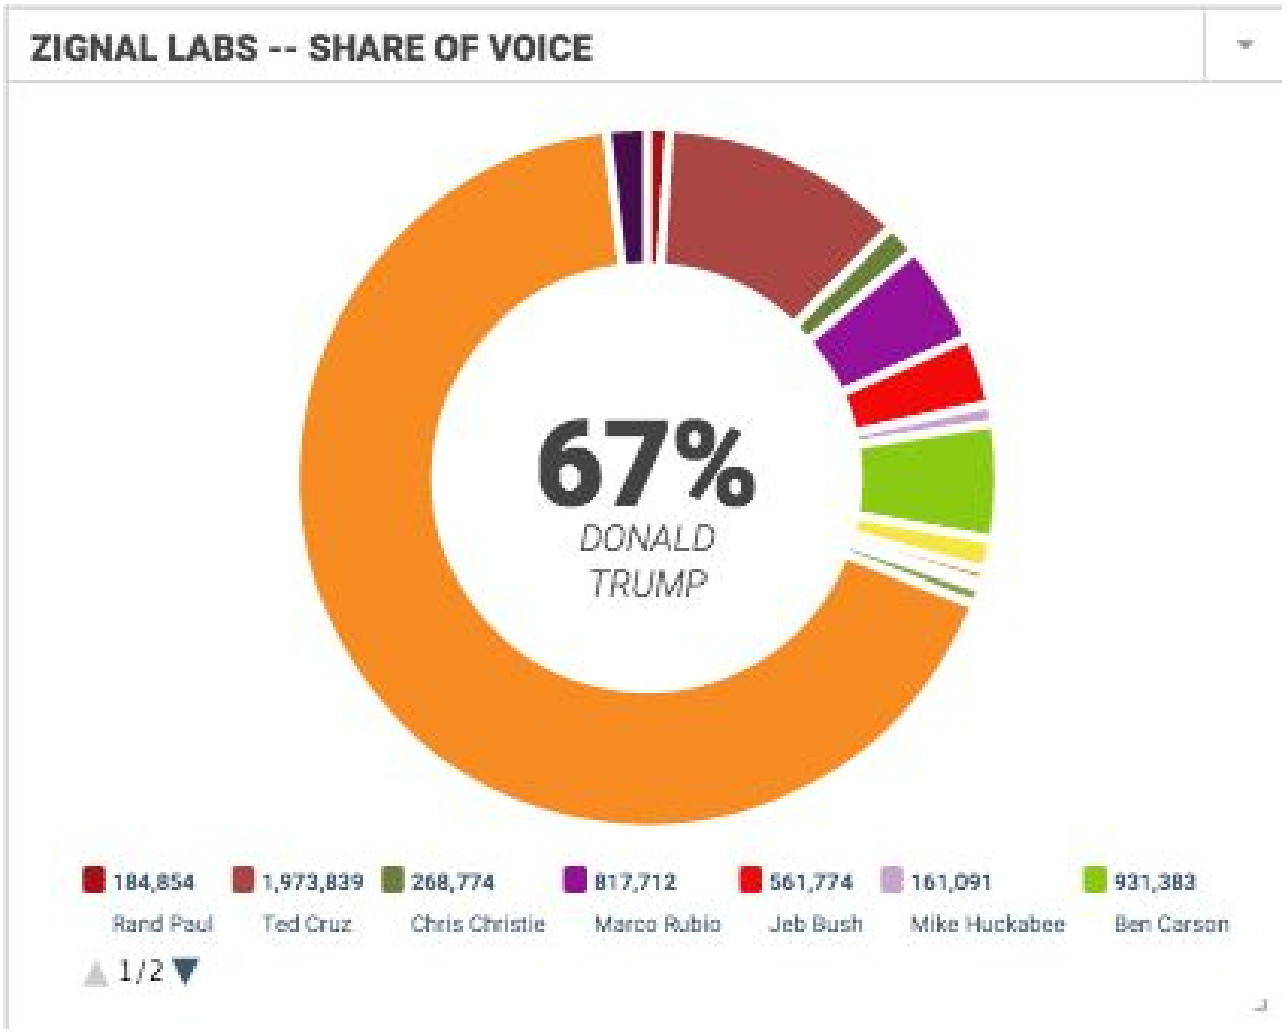
Tweets, 532,000 news articles and 422,000 television mentions of the GOP field. Of course, most of that, 12 million total crossmedia mentions, have been about Trump, according to our analytics partners at Zignal Labs.



Trump is more of a media sensation than ever before. The chart below shows all Trump mentions since his campaign launched six months ago. Note that the media attention lavished on Trump now is at an all-time high:

Separately, a Twitter spokesman emails that last week was the most-Tweeted-about, non-debate week of the campaign, and the highest level of Twitter conversation about Trump since we started counting back in July. There were about 3.5 million Tweets sent last week mentioning Trump, which is about double his weekly average."

Cruz's rise in the polls has been followed by more media coverage. Others like Carson and Fiorina have fallen back as the Iowa Caucuses approach. The chart below shows how mentions of Carson have fallen off dramatically since the last debate:

the last debate:

1. Religion
2. Iraq, Syria and ISIS
3. Homeland Security and Terrorism
4. Guns
5. Immigration

The chart below shows the number of unique people on Facebook in the U.S. engaging in the conversation about each of the candidates – as well as the number of interactions those people made. A Facebook spokesman explains that interactions are the total aggregate number of likes, posts, comments and shares made about a particular candidate within the timeframe. One way to say this, for example, is that in the last month, 1.9 million people in the U.S. on Facebook posted about, shared content, liked or commented on content about Marco Rubio more than 4.6 million times:

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Rally in Jacksonville, FL

Hello all,

Unfortunately we were not able to send a tracker to today's event but we were able to capture today's event via live streaming.

Big Highlights

- McCain: "Sen. Obama's been saying some pretty nasty things about Gov. Palin and me over the past few days [loud boos]. That's ok. That's ok. He can attack if he wants but all the insults in the world won't bring change to Washington and they're not going to change Sen. Obama's record."
- Mentions Afghanistan in a litany of problems in the world; says Taliban is regrouping; no push for more troops
- Pledges to revamp the patchwork quilt of regulatory processes for the banking industry
- Obama's party's been in charge the last couple of years, have you seen any improvement? [loud boos]

The Beginning of the End of the Cold War

William Rivers Pitt, Truthout: The Soviet Union may be gone, but the Cold War never really ended. By any measurable standard, the United States, its people, its politics and its profiteering ethos stand as a bent monument to that era, which never really ended, but only metastasized into the so-called war on terror.

Subject: Three faculty members appointed to endowed professorships

Dear Knox Community,

It gives me very great pleasure to announce that three of our colleagues have been appointed to endowed professorships in recognition of their distinguished teaching, scholarship, and service to Knox College. I have made these appointments upon the recommendation of the Faculty Personnel Committee and the Dean of the College, and am grateful for their good counsel.

Dr. Heather Hoffman, Professor of Psychology, has been named as the Robert M. and Katherine A. Seeley Distinguished Professorship, succeeding Professor Emeritus George Steckley. Hoffman joined the Knox faculty in 1987, and specializes in human sexual psychophysiology, including the origins of patterns of sexual attraction and sexual arousal. In addition, her work in neuroscience includes examining developmental differences in learning in rats and the role of monoamine and neuropeptide transmitters in such ontogenetic differences. Hoffman received her Ph.D. and M.A. in psychology from the State University of New York-Binghamton, and her B.A. in psychology from Lafayette College. She currently serves as President of the International Academy of Sex Research. Hoffmann has received grants from the National Institutes of Health and from the Foundation for the Scientific Study of Sexuality and was named a Research Fellow at the Kinsey Institute for Research in Sex, Gender, and Reproduction at Indiana University. In addition to national and international presentations, her work has been published in numerous professional journals. In 1991, she was awarded the Phillip Green Wright-Lombard College Prize for Distinguished Teaching at Knox College.

The Robert M. and Katherine A. Seeley Distinguished Professorship was established in 1998 through a bequest from their son, Robert A. Seeley, Knox College Class of 1951. Robert Arnold Seeley '51, and Katherine Arnold Seeley '22, were direct descendants of Sylvanus Ferris, one of the founders and initial trustees of Knox College, and of Benjamin Franklin Arnold, a trustee of the College from 1899 until his death in 1920. While an undergraduate, Robert Arnold Seeley was a member of Phi Sigma Kappa Fraternity; upon graduation he pursued a career in the insurance industry, initially in his home community of Freeport, Illinois. In 1954 he married Nancy Ferguson, a graduate of Stanford University. Katherine Arnold Seeley, a native of Galesburg, was involved in a variety of activities while an undergraduate, including membership in Delta Delta Delta sorority, and remained active throughout her life in community affairs in Freeport. In 1927 she married Robert M. Seeley, an insurance executive who had attended the University of Illinois. Nancy Ferguson Seeley remains a leadership donor to Knox, including support for Alumni Hall and the naming of an Admission counseling office in honor of the Knox connections of her husband and mother-in-law.

Dr. Konrad Hamilton, Associate Professor and Chair of History, has been named as the Burkhardt Distinguished Chair in History, succeeding Professor Catherine Denial, who has been named to the inaugural Bright Professorship in History (see below). Dr. Hamilton joined the Knox faculty in 1995, and specializes on the history of affirmative action policy and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in the United States. He also has engaged in a comparative historiographical study of emancipation in the British Caribbean and the United States. Dr. Hamilton received his Ph.D. and M.A. in U.S. history from Stanford University; an M.A. in public historical studies from the University of California-Santa Barbara, and a B.A. in history, with honors, from the University of Oregon. At Knox, Hamilton plays a pivotal role in considering how Martin Luther King's life and words continue to be relevant in the 21st century. He also served as project historian at the Grant Wood History Institute, focusing on "Teaching Reconstruction for Middle School Teachers, Teaching Liberalism and Conservatism in the 20th Century." His teaching at Knox includes courses in the Black Image in American Film, Environmental Racism, America in the 1960s, Slavery in the Americas, Themes in African-American Political Thought since Emancipation, The Great Society, and The American Civil Rights Movement. Dr. Hamilton also served as co-director of the SPARK program in its inaugural year, lending his expertise on the millennial generation in Knox's College readiness program.

The Burkhardt Distinguished Chair in History was established in 2010 through the generosity of Dr. Richard W. Burkhardt '39 and Dorothy Johnson Burkhardt '39; it followed the 2009 Burkhardt Distinguished Chair in Modern Languages. Both Burkhardts had long and distinguished careers in the academy. Dr. Burkhardt was a member of the faculties of Syracuse and Ball State Universities; he served as vice president and dean of the faculty at Ball State and retired in 1985. Mrs. Burkhardt served as instructor of French, Spanish and Russian, also at Ball State, from 1958 to 1983, and was awarded the Palmes Academiques by the French government for her efforts to promote cross-cultural learning between France and the United States. She was a member of the Board of Trustees at Knox from 1976 to 1990, when she was elected a life trustee.

Dr. Catherine Denial, Associate Professor of History, will be the inaugural holder of the Mary Elizabeth Hand Bright and Edwin Winslow Bright Professorship of American History. Dr. Denial joined the Knox faculty in 2005 and specializes in property and kinship in Dakota country and history pedagogy and curriculum. She received her Ph.D. in history from the University of Iowa after completing an M.A. from the University of Wisconsin and a B.A. with Honors in American studies at the University of Nottingham, England. Her publications include Making Marriage: Husbands, Wives, and the American State in Dakota and Ojibwe Country (2013), as well as articles, reviews, and web publications in her other areas of specialization. Denial also served as the lead historian for the U.S. Department of Education program on "Bringing History Home and the Grant Wood History Institute" (2001-2012). Her teaching at Knox includes courses on the American West, Great American Debates, Feminist Methodologies, the Historian's Workshop, and Museums, Monuments and Memory. In addition, Dr. Denial served as co-director of the SPARK program in its inaugural year and is a co-facilitator of Knox's Intergroup Dialogue Program.

The Mary Elizabeth Hand Bright and Edwin Winslow Bright Professorship of American History is supported through a trust established by Edwin W. Bright and his wife, Mary Elizabeth Hand Bright, a 1944 alumna of Knox College. Mrs. Bright came from Morristown, New Jersey to Knox College. After receiving her degree in history, she volunteered for the WACs, did her basic training in Georgia, and worked in Washington, DC during WW II. After the war she worked as a reference librarian. Mr. Bright graduated from Columbia in 1942 where he majored in engineering. During WW II, Ed received a direct commission in the Navy and worked on electronics. After many years of marriage, Mary Elizabeth passed away in 2008 followed by Ed in 2013. It was their intent for their bequests to support the study of early American history at Knox, defined as before the Civil War. Their interest in early American history may have stemmed from the fact that Edwin Winslow, Ed's ancestor, came to the U.S. on the Mayflower and Mary Elizabeth's ancestors hit American soil in 1633 or thereabouts. Ed and Mary Elizabeth Bright established two other funds at Knox College: the Bright Scholarship Fund, which is awarded to a student majoring in American history and the Bright Book Fund for early American history.

Please join me in congratulating Professors Hoffman, Hamilton, and Denial and in thanking our donors for their generous support of the Knox College faculty. I am delighted that we can honor their teaching, scholarship, and service through these appointments.

One thing I think we need to push, that was effective in our groups, is to remind people of the wonderful things that the Clinton Foundation has done around the globe. In the midst of all this incoming stuff, can we remind the world what has been accomplished? In addition to confronting the accusations, do we also have an opportunity to insert the message below that was an effective response in our vulnerability research:

Hillary Clinton's opponents are trying to start a controversy where none exists. The Clinton Foundation is a totally non-political charity whose work saves and improves lives at home and around the world. Because of charitable contributions to the Foundation and its programs, 8 million people have benefited from lifesaving HIV/AIDS medications, 6,000 American schools are providing kids with healthy food choices in an effort to fight childhood obesity; 28,000 African farmers have improved their crops; and 248 million tons of greenhouse gas emissions are being reduced in cities worldwide. The Clinton Global Initiative brings together people from business, labor, government, and the non-profit world to solve problems without politics or gridlock. Republican opponents want to confuse voters about the Clinton Foundation and its donors because all this good work is proof that what Hillary cares about most is helping hard-working people and families build better lives.

Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts in Boston last month. She met privately with Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. over the weekend. Brian Snyder/Reuters

By Maggie Haberman

Good Monday morning, as President Obama's vacation comes to an end and as Donald J. Trump continues to drive the discussion on the trail and on the Sunday talk shows. But, as the August lull winds down, another political intrigue, filled with whispers, speculation and a seemingly significant private meeting, deepens.

In any month other than August in the Summer of Trump, the fact that a sitting vice president asked a major progressive avatar to meet with him before a decision about a presidential campaign would have been a news bomb.

The private meeting on Saturday between Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. and Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts may have gotten less attention than it might have otherwise, but it was the clearest signal yet of Mr. Biden's seriousness in thinking about entering the race. The two spoke for well over an hour about a range of policy issues and the presidential campaign.

They met at his residence at the Naval Observatory, which is just a short distance from the Washington home of Hillary Rodham Clinton, the poll leader in the Democratic nominating contest, who is facing the roughest patch of her candidacy amid questions about her use of a private email server while she was secretary of state.

Mr. Biden's advisers are not in harmony about whether he has a viable path. Some of his aides have strenuously sought to play down his outreach as he considers what to do.

But Ms. Warren has declined to endorse Mrs. Clinton so far, and the two are far from political allies or friends. Ms. Warren's storm-the-gates populist rhetorical style is not Mrs. Clinton's, and some progressives still hope that Ms. Warren will change her mind and run herself.

If Mr. Biden does decide to run, the meeting will be remembered as a turning point. If he does not, it will be seen by some as a hostile act toward Mrs. Clinton as she hits choppy waters.

What We're Watching This Week

- Mr. Obama returned to Washington on Sunday and will leave again on Monday for Las Vegas, where he will speak at the National Clean Energy Summit meeting , an event co-sponsored by Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, who on Sunday voiced his support for the Obama administration's nuclear deal with Iran.

- Senator Ted Cruz of Texas, who on Friday hosted a "religious liberty" rally in Iowa, sent a "personal invitation" email to religious leaders to "join with me and thousands of pastors and church leaders" on Tuesday to discuss the videos accusing Planned Parenthood of selling fetal tissue for a profit. "We cannot allow this to continue," the email says.

- Jeb Bush, who has been in an increasing battle of words with Mr. Trump over immigration and other issues, will be in McAllen, Texas, on Monday to "discuss border security" with local officials, his campaign said.

- And on Thursday, Mr. Obama will visit New Orleans to commemorate the 10th anniversary of Hurricane Katrina, meet with residents and speak about the city's rebuilding efforts.

Obama to Speak to Jewish Groups About Iran Deal

In early August, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel spoke to American Jews in a live webcast meant to help spread Mr. Netanyahu's warning that Mr. Obama's nuclear deal with Iran would lead to more terror and attacks in the region.

Now, it's Mr. Obama's turn.

Two Jewish organizations announced last week that the president would participate in a live webcast to their membership on Friday as part of his efforts to build support for the agreement between Iran, the United States and five other world powers.

"We are honored that President Obama will join us for this important discussion," said Michael Siegal, the chairman of the Board of the Jewish Federations of North America, one of the two organizations sponsoring the webcast. The other group is the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

The president's decision to hold a webcast continues the tit-for-tat actions taken by the two world leaders before a vote by Congress in mid-September about whether to approve the deal.

On the webcast, Mr. Obama will make remarks and take questions, the groups said.

O'Malley, on 'This Week,' Criticizes Clinton Over Emails

It was one of the most famous and damning remarks during the Watergate scandal: "What did the president know, and when did he know it?" Senator Howard H. Baker Jr. of Tennessee asked of his fellow Republican, Richard M. Nixon, as the abuse-of-power investigation intensified. While the rhetorical construction has been used in partisan fights ever since, Martin O'Malley, a Democratic presidential candidate, has recently revived it as a line of attack against a fellow party member – and 2016 rival – Mrs. Clinton.

Appearing on ABC's "This Week" news program on Sunday, Mr. O'Malley was asked if he thought Mrs. Clinton was honest and trustworthy in light of continuing questions about her private email use as secretary of state. He used the question to repeat his call for more Democratic presidential debates than the party has sanctioned – but he also used the Bakerism to knock Mrs. Clinton, as he did a few days earlier.

"Until we start having debates, and offering those ideas that move our country forward, we're going to be bogged down in questions of, what did Hillary Clinton know and when did she know it?" said Mr. O'Malley, the former governor of Maryland. "And we cannot allow our party to be branded by those sorts of questions of the past. We have to look to the future. And we have to offer the ideas that move our country forward for the future."

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton's campaign did not return an email seeking comment.

Social Media Teams Add to Ranks With Insiders: Candidates' Families

They often have a unique view of the campaign trail: behind the scenes, exceptional access to the candidate and a perspective just slightly closer to the ground than the adults.

The children of the presidential candidates see the campaign like few others, and last weekend, Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey handed over his Snapchat account – Christie.2016 – to his four children to let them show his followers what life on the trail is like for them.

They walked right behind the governor as he strolled through the fair, took shots of Mom signing autographs and Dad doing an interview on Fox News.

They also took videos of fair rides, fried ice cream stands, and of Andrew, the oldest son, winning a large stuffed basketball; they playfully shove the camera in one another's faces at the end of a video segment.

"They were like, 'We're on the road, we're out there, we're doing stuff, we want to help,' " Lauren Fritts, the digital director of the Christie campaign, said of the children's desire to get involved. She said she gave them no instruction and just let their personalities show through on the account.

Social media platforms are giving candidates' children and families – often part of the stagecraft but rarely too involved in messaging – a new role on the campaign trail. Matt and Alex, Mr. Walker's college-age sons, have taken to posting on Medium from the trail.

The Christie children weren't the only family members taking to social media; Mary Pat Christie, Mr. Christie's wife, took over the campaign Instagram. And while she's not a regular user like her children, she seemed to enjoy the experience.

"I think she caught the bug," said Samantha Smith, the Christie campaign

Bloomberg: "Hillary Clinton Leads in New Hampshire by Historic Margin"

By Lisa Lerer

November 24, 2014, 6:01 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] New Hampshire primary voters are ready for Hillary, though they have some questions about the Democrats.

Hillary Clinton holds a historic lead in the New Hampshire Democratic primary, although a shift in opinion about the party's brand could be a drag on her candidacy in the general election.

Sixty-two percent of likely Democratic voters in the early primary state said they support Clinton in a new Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm New Hampshire Poll of likely primary voters conducted by Purple Insights. It's an advantage that puts her in elite company: Only former Massachusetts Senator Ted Kennedy in 1980 and former Vice President Al Gore in 2000 have broken the 50 percent mark more than six months before the primary. "Clinton's numbers are so strong that it seems inconceivable that she could have any serious challenger," said Neil Levesque, executive director of the New Hampshire Institute of Politics at Saint Anselm College.

While she leads in the primary, the results harbor dangerous signals for Democrats. When asked which party's nominee is more likely to "care about people like you," a trait traditionally associated with Clinton's party, voters were almost equally divided, with 40 percent saying Democrats and 39 percent picking Republicans. In exit polls conducted after the 2012 presidential election, 55 percent of New Hampshire voters sided with President Barack Obama and 42 percent with former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney when asked to select the candidate who "is more in touch with people like you."

"Republicans are sticking to pocketbook issues and focusing on reigning the government in," said Kerry Marsh, a Manchester-based Republican strategist with Spectrum Marketing Companies. "I think we're finally doing that right."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Though New Hampshire is a small state, it has voted for the winner of the White House in eight of the last nine presidential elections. Clinton runs nearly even with Romney in a head-to-head match-up, with 46 percent of likely general election voters selecting the former first lady and secretary of state and 45 percent selecting the former Massachusetts governor. She has a wider lead—7 percentage points—against Kentucky Senator Rand Paul and former Florida Governor Jeb Bush, whom she beats 47-39 among the same group.

A surprise upset by Clinton in 2008 saved her presidential bid and marked the start of a five-month primary slog with Obama. “As I caution all presidential candidates in New Hampshire, taking New Hampshire for granted is very dangerous,” said Terry Shumaker, a Manchester attorney and Clinton supporter. “Last time, I believe, Hillary Clinton had an almost 30-point lead in the polls in our state in the summer. That lead melted like an ice sculpture on the mall in July and she came back and won our primary by three points.”

Her primary win highlighted another quirk of the Granite State: women rule. Female politicians currently hold the governor's mansion and every seat in the congressional delegation. (That will change in January, when Republican Frank Guinta replaces Democrat Carol Shea-Porter.) “Unlike past human history, being a woman in New Hampshire is an advantage in any Democratic primary and with the independents as well,” said Ray Buckley, the chairman of the New Hampshire Democratic Party. “All things being equal, our primary voters would tend to vote for a woman.”

Among all likely voters in the state, Clinton has the highest favorability rating with 51 percent of voters expressing a positive opinion about her. Republican Senator Kelly Ayotte and Romney, who owns a vacation home in the state, came in second at 47 percent each.

While her lead hardly guarantees the nomination, Clinton's dominance in the early polling may deter other Democrats from jumping into the race. Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren, at 13 percent support, comes the closest to Clinton of any potential Democratic challenger, though voters are pretty much split in their opinions of her with 34 percent rating her favorably and 35 percent giving her a negative review.

Other candidates, including Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley, Vice President Joe Biden, Massachusetts Governor Deval Patrick, and independent Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, lag in the single digits.

New Hampshire Democrats attribute at least a piece of her edge to the Clinton family's long history in the state. “Former President Bill Clinton has been here yearly for decades,” Buckley said. “They first came up in '79. So, there's a long, long relationship with the Clintons' and New Hampshire.”

The poll, which was conducted Nov. 12-18, has a margin of error of plus or minus 4.9 percent for questions regarding the Democratic primary, and 4.4 percent for those asked of all likely voters.

New York Times: “Authors Sign Up to Raise Barnes & Noble’s Sales”

By Alexandra Alter

November 23, 2014

In an effort to increase holiday sales, which have fallen for the last two seasons, Barnes & Noble is hoping to lure customers into stores this Black Friday with something book lovers cannot download: signed copies.

The chain recruited 100 prominent authors — including Donna Tartt, David Mitchell, Dan Brown, E. L. James, Jeff Kinney, George W. Bush and Hillary Clinton — to each sign roughly 5,000 copies of their latest books. The company will distribute the 500,000 signed books among its more than 650 retail stores.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Customers get inundated with discounts and offers from every other retailer," said Mary Amicucci, vice president for adult trade and children's books at Barnes & Noble. "The goal was to find an exciting reason for people to come to Barnes & Noble early in the morning and get something that they can't get on any other day of the year."

Drawing customers into its physical stores has become an urgent priority for Barnes & Noble. The chain has been battered in recent years by competition from Amazon and by a sluggish book market. It has closed more than 20 stores since summer 2013 and will spin off its money-losing Nook division into a separate company next year.

Holiday sales at its retail stores and website have declined for the last two seasons. In 2013, sales in the nine-week holiday period fell nearly 7 percent to $1.1 billion compared with the previous year, and in 2012, sales fell nearly 11 percent to $1.2 billion.

Ms. Amicucci said the initiative began seven months ago when Barnes & Noble compiled a wish list of 50 authors. When the first batch of authors responded enthusiastically, the company recruited another 50. Some authors went further, adding little illustrations to the books. Brandon Stanton, the author of "Humans of New York," drew dinosaurs, while Mo Willems, a children's book author, sketched his popular pigeon character.

Some authors said they hoped the new campaign would help the struggling chain.

"The presence of a bookstore in a neighborhood matters," said Lisa Scottoline, who signed 5,000 copies of her novel "Betrayed." "If it's not physically present, we will have fewer readers."

David Baldacci, who signed several thousand copies of his new book, "The Escape," said he hoped the effort would help the last big bookstore chain standing to better compete against Amazon. "You can go online and buy any book you want, but there's not a lot of excitement with clicking the buy button," he said.

Independent bookstores are also counting on authors to draw customers for the holidays, a period when many of them make as much as 30 percent of their annual sales. As part of the American Booksellers Association's "Indies First" holiday initiative, about 1,200 authors will sign books, greet customers and, in some cases, work behind the counter at more than 400 independent bookstores around the country this Saturday.

As part of the effort, the fantasy and graphic novelist Neil Gaiman and his wife, the author, musician and performance artist Amanda Palmer, will be at the Golden Notebook in Woodstock, N.Y., and two other New York bookstores; Geraldine Brooks will work alongside booksellers at Bunch of Grapes Bookstore in Vineyard Haven, Mass.; and Sherman Alexie will volunteer at three Seattle-area bookstores.

Oren Teicher, chief executive of the American Booksellers Association, said author appearances and signed copies were among the best weapons brick-and-mortar stores had against online retailers.

"Books are identical no matter where you buy them," he said. "You don't get a different or better ending if you buy them from us."

Washington Post: "For Democrats, Hillary Clinton just has to say 'Go.' For voters, she'll have to say much more."

By Dan Balz

November 22, 2014

NEW YORK — It was all Hillary Clinton, all day, Friday in New York, a day that helped crystallize how much already has been done for the prospective presidential candidate by others and, more importantly, what she has yet to do for herself.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The events included a day-long session for the donors to Ready for Hillary, the political action committee founded in early 2013 to help encourage Clinton to run for president. She did not appear at the event, but many of the Clinton clique were there.

In the evening, it was the former secretary of state herself in the limelight at a black-tie gala hosted by the New-York Historical Society Museum & Library, where she was given the History Makers award.

Ready for Hillary started on a shoestring, dismissed by some in Clinton world as a quixotic enterprise. It has grown into something far more important and valuable to a potential candidate whose top-down campaign in 2008 was one (but not the only) factor that led to her defeat to Barack Obama in the contest for the Democratic nomination.

Because of the work of Ready for Hillary, if Clinton decides to run for president, she will instantly have access to what the group's leaders say is a list of roughly 3 million people who have signed up as supporters, volunteers, donors or all of the above. Ready for Hillary will shut down if and when Clinton announces her candidacy. The list can't simply be handed over to her, but she will easily be able to convert fruits of the organization's efforts into a Hillary for President ground army.

Many people deserve credit for this. One is Adam Parkhomenko, the young and tireless co-founder of the group, who has been looking to help make Clinton president of the United States since he was in high school and who overcame the doubters with his energy and a strategic grasp of the techniques and imperatives of the most modern of campaigns.

Another who gets credit is Craig Smith, who has been part of the Clintons' world for more than two decades and whose arrival at Ready for Hillary signaled to many longtime Clinton loyalists — and donors — that the organization deserved their backing, financial and otherwise. About $10 million has been raised since the founding.

Friday's gathering in New York seemed very much like both a Clinton political family reunion and the gathering-before-the-storm. In attendance were scores of people from across the country, many of them instrumental in helping Bill Clinton become president, some who served him as president, and all of them now are just as determined to see Hillary Clinton get to the White House in her own right.

The speakers constituted a who's who of Clinton loyalists, from strategists James Carville and Paul Begala to Agriculture Secretary Tom Vilsack to former White House deputy chief of staff Harold Ickes. Equally notable were those from Obama's political orbit and others who are now part of the Ready for Hillary operation or any of the other pro-Clinton political committees and organizations that have been founded in the past two years.

Without doing anything other than not saying "no" to a second presidential campaign, without having to make any of the hard calls of putting a campaign together, Hillary Clinton has benefitted enormously from the work of all these people. It's fair to say that no one seeking the Democratic nomination — no one who wasn't already an incumbent president at least — will have the kind of machinery in place that now exists for her.

One example: Jerry Crawford, the Iowan who has been a top adviser through all the Clintons' campaigns, told reporters Friday that the work of Ready For Hillary has been "extraordinary" in preparing for a 2016 candidacy.

"We will be at or beyond on day one of the Clinton campaign, if and when it comes, where we ended up last time," he said.

What Clinton hasn't yet done for herself, however, remains the key to her real hopes of winning the White House. One is to organize a campaign that is more disciplined and more strategic than her campaign of 2008. She cannot afford another messy campaign operation, and how she avoids that will take considerable thinking.

Still, machinery doesn't win elections, which means the second and more important step for her is to know exactly why she wants to run for president again and how she is alike and different from her husband and Obama, and then to be able to articulate those reasons in a compelling and forward-looking message.

Clinton is nibbled from all sides as she thinks through the rationale for a campaign. On the left are rising demands for a populist economic message of the kind associated with Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts. She has edged toward that, but sometimes awkwardly, as when she said last month, “businesses don’t create jobs,” a shorthand that baffled nearly everyone by its inarticulateness.

For Bill Clinton, opportunity — not class warfare — long has been at the core of his message. Hillary Clinton, however, runs in different times than did her husband, a time of greater inequality and underlying frustration. The balancing act is more challenging today than it was for him.

At the award dinner Friday night, Hillary Clinton picked up on the theme of opportunity in a conversation with author Walter Isaacson. He asked her how having a granddaughter has affected her thinking.

After the usual grandmotherly statements about how special her granddaughter is and will be, she took note of the world of privilege into which baby Charlotte was born and will be raised. But then she noted that many other children born on the same day as her granddaughter would grow up in circumstances far more challenged and challenging. “Talent is universal,” she said. “Opportunity is not.”

Can candidate Clinton articulate with both specificity and inspiration how to widen the circle of opportunity?

Her prospective candidacy offers the possibility of the first female president in history, but for all the power behind that aspiration, it is not a message. Nor, as the midterms proved, are narrow appeals to women of the kind that fell short for Democratic candidates for Senate in Iowa and Colorado — two states vitally important in a general election.

Nor can she count on the “demography is destiny” theme that many Democrats see as their ace in the hole in future presidential campaigns. In the corridors at the Ready For Hillary meeting, more than one Clinton loyalist said that will not be enough to win in 2016.

The black-tie dinner was also a reminder of the potential gap between Clinton and the voters she will appeal to if she is a candidate. Much of the conversation with Isaacson was about the Roosevelts — Franklin, Eleanor and Teddy. One point made by both Clinton and Isaacson was that while the Roosevelts came from privileged circumstances, they found in public service ways to advocate for those without.

At the Ready For Hillary meeting, one person, who did not want to be identified in order to speak more candidly, said she should run for president not as Hillary Clinton but as “Hillary Smith,” shorn of accolades and awards that have come at her for so many years. It was good advice, not exactly starting over, but starting fresh.

What Friday reinforced is what many in her party recognize. Democrats may be ready for Hillary. The bigger question is: When will Hillary be ready?

Talking Points Memo: “Hillary's Biggest 2016 Challenge Might Start With An 'O'”

By Dylan Scott

November 24, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EST

One of the most important elements of a Hillary Clinton 2016 presidential candidacy might be completely out of her hands.

Two of the favored rhetorical questions around her presumed bid are: How much will she distance herself from President Barack Obama? And, relatedly, will she be able to capture the Obama coalition that propelled the President to victory twice, but hasn't shown up in the midterm elections?

They are of course linked: If Obama is unpopular, a Clinton campaign will be tempted to present a sharp contrast. At the same time, the President will likely remain popular with the core Democratic base that she needs to harness. But the record tells us that, however the Obama presidency is faring like in its final months, it's going to influence his aspiring successor's White House ambitions.

The third-term problem is a historical fact at this point: U.S. voters just don't choose to give a party three (or more) consecutive terms in the White House. Since FDR, George H.W. Bush is the only President to be elected to succeed a two-term predecessor from the same party.

Political scientists have documented the link between presidential approval rating and final vote tallies (regardless of whether it is an open election or an incumbent is running.) In a 2012 book, "The Timeline of Presidential Elections", Columbia University's Robert Erikson and the University of Texas's Christopher Wlezien concluded that presidential approval rating is one of the best indicators of what the actual vote will look like.

"(Obama's) approval rating has real bearing on 2016," Wlezien told TPM in an email.

The link might not be as strong as it otherwise would be when a President is running for re-election, John Sides, a political scientist at George Washington University, told TPM. But based on his own look at the data, Sides said, it still has an effect on an open race, as 2016 will be.

"When the incumbent is not running, better approval ratings still appear to help the incumbent party's new candidate," he said, "but the relationship is weaker."

If better approval ratings help, then worse ones could surely hurt. Obama is currently sitting at 42 percent, according to Gallup. He was at 52 percent when he won re-election in 2012 with 51 percent of the popular vote. Reagan was polling at 51 percent in October 1988 and Bush took 53 percent of the popular vote, per the archive of Gallup polls compiled by the University of Connecticut.

Much has already been made of any moments in which Clinton has been perceived to be distancing herself from the President. The response to her interview with The Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg, in which she appeared to criticize the Obama White House's "don't do stupid stuff" mantra in foreign policy, was a classic example. It can sometimes be overwrought.

Things could certainly change by November 2016. Reagan sank as low as 43 percent in March 1987 by the end of the Iran Contra scandal. He had managed to recover by the time Bush was on the ballot. Still, it will be important for Clinton to avoid being lumped in with the Obama administration or even the first Clinton administration, one Democratic strategist advocating for a Hillary 2016 bid said.

"If she decides to run, she should not run as a third Bill Clinton term or a third Barack Obama term," Craig Smith, Clinton White House political director and a senior adviser to the Ready for Hillary PAC, said on Friday when asked by TPM. "She should run for a first Hillary Clinton term."

How easy will that be, given the historical precedents and her tenure as one of the top Cabinet officials in the Obama administration?

"As long as she lays out a clear vision of where she wants to take this country and a clear message about why she's doing this," he said, "I think it'll be fine."

Republicans, for their part, seem intent on linking Clinton to the Obama presidency as frequently as possible. It has already become a staple of GOP messaging, and the anti-Clinton PAC America Rising has purchased an online home for it: Obama3rdTerm.com.

"There is no major issue in which Sec. Clinton and President Obama disagree. She was the Mother of Obamacare, the face of his foreign policy, and a behind the scenes advocate for all his domestic initiatives," Tim Miller, America Rising PAC's executive director, told TPM in an email. "Any idea that she will be able to effectively distance herself from him ignores reality."

Real Clear Politics: "Carville: 'There's Not Much Appetite In Democratic Party For Somebody Other Than Hillary Clinton'"

[No Writer Mentioned]

November 23, 2014

On Sunday's edition of This Week, Democratic strategist James Carville said there's not much appetite for someone other than Hillary Clinton in the Democratic party and Democrats across the nation.

"When Secretary Clinton runs," Carville definitively said, "she's going to run on her own agenda and think there's going to be a lot."

"There's not much appetite in the Democratic party and around the country for somebody other than Hillary Clinton. This is something that they make up," Carville said to host George Stephanopoulos.

"The Republicans will need all the help they want to win a presidential race. I'm not worried. Everything helps Republicans if you listen to them. Obama helps Republicans. Hillary is going to help Republicans. I mean, the sun coming up helps Republicans. Why don't they win some elections?" Carville added.

JAMES CARVILLE: All evidence is from '94 to '96, from 2010 to 2012. All evidence is that it doesn't matter. It's a different kind of an event. Now, I think that when Secretary Clinton runs, she's going to run on her own agenda and think there's going to be a lot. I think she's going to take this thing very seriously, is going to run very hard and I think --

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS, THIS WEEK: where does she break for President Obama? where does she break from President Obama?

CARVILLE: I think she'll say he's done remarkable things as president but the one thing we haven't done -- the great unfinished work for this nation is how do we build a middle class and that was the one thing that I want to do. That is the great that the United States is faced with is we have lost our essence because we're becoming too separated by income and everything else. I think that's her message and she can be as critical as she wants about that...

I think that beltway liberals -- and I believe this, and I really respect you and I like your magazine (The Nation), there's not much appetite in the Democratic party and around the country for somebody other than Hillary Clinton. This is something that they make up --

MATTHEW DOWD, ABC NEWS: It's true and it's going to help Republicans in the general election.

CARVILLE: Again, I go out there --

DR. BEN CARSON: I agree with you.

CARVILLE: And you go watch it. The Republicans will need all the help they want to win a presidential race. I'm not worried. Everything helps Republicans if you listen to them. Obama helps Republicans. Hillary is going to help Republicans. I mean, the sun coming up helps Republicans. Why don't they win some elections?

The Daily Beast: Jeff Greenfield: "Want President Hillary? Then Primary Her"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Jeff Greenfield

November 24, 2014

[Subtitle:] How Michael Dukakis's failure in 1988 shows how helpful a tough, drawn-out primary can be for the Democratic frontrunner.

I asked Google to find stories about a potential challenge to Hillary Clinton's presumed Presidential run, and in about a third of a second, I was offered 37,500,000 of them.

There's no point in recycling the same list of possible foes, nor the competing arguments for and against a contested nomination. (There's an excellent take that appeared on this site last September: Yes, sometimes a contest be invigorating—Reagan in '80, Clinton in '92, Obama in '08—and sometimes it can open wounds that never heal—Goldwater in '64, McGovern in '72, Ford in '76, Carter in '80.

But if you're looking for a telling example of a politically helpful primary challenge, there's no better example than one that should have happened, almost happened, but didn't.

It happened—or didn't—in 1988, when Massachusetts Governor Michael Dukakis was grinding his way to the Democratic nomination. Two potentially major rivals had long since been sidelined: Senator Joe Biden by charges of plagiarism, and former Senator Gary Hart by—well, you know. Those in the race—Senator Paul Simon, Rep. Dick Gephardt, Rev. Jesse Jackson—were far behind. Another dark horse, Tennessee Senator Al Gore, was finding little traction in his efforts to become a centrist alternative.

Gore's last stand would be in the New York primary. On April 12, during a debate sponsored by the Daily News, Gore confronted Dukakis with an issue that had not surfaced at any time during the campaign. Why, Gore wanted to know, did Dukakis support a state program that gave weekend furloughs to convicted criminals, even after some of those prisoners had committed crimes while on furlough? The audience booed the question, Dukakis went on to win the New York primary convincingly, and Gore dropped out of the Presidential race.

If you're familiar with recent political history, you know what happened next. James Pinkerton, a policy aide in the campaign of George H.W. Bush, found press reports that detailed the story of Willie Horton—a convicted murder who, while out on furlough, had terrorized a Maryland couple and raped the woman. Bush campaign chief Lee Atwater watched focus groups move sharply away from Dukakis when they learned of the story. (Atwater said at one point that by the time the campaign was over, voters would think of Horton as Dukakis' running mate). Bush himself raised the furlough issue—without mentioning Horton by name—during his RNC acceptance speech, and the campaign featured an ad showing showing men in prison garb moving through a revolving door.

Then an independent campaign—the National Security Political Action Committee—put on its own ad, showing the mug shot of Willie Horton looking very menacing and very, very black. To this day, Bush media maven Roger Ailes adamantly denies that he or the campaign had any role in the Willie Horton mug shot ad. And to this day, liberals in the political world use the name "Willie Horton" to describe an appeal to primal racial fears.

Now consider a different question: suppose Al Gore had stayed in the race. Or suppose another of Dukakis' opponents—Jesse Jackson, most intriguingly—had kept the question alive. Was it really a good idea to furlough convicted murderers? Was it a mistake to veto the bill that would have curtailed such furloughs? For a one-time political operative like myself, it offers the possibility of a rarely seen event in campaigns: the open, frank admission of a mistake.

"Candidates always like to tell you what they did right," I imagine Dukakis saying. "Now I want to tell you what I did wrong—and what I learned from it. Giving prisoners a chance at redemption is a good idea; but we were too careless, and innocent people suffered because it it. I think it taught me to ask harder questions about good intentions; it's a lesson I intend to remember as President."

I'm not suggesting that it would have changed the outcome of the 1988 election; and you have to question the overall tactical shrewdness of any campaign that sent its candidate riding around in a tank looking like Snoopy heading out to fight the Red Baron.

What the "missing furlough" debate does tell us, however, is that a candidate who is not confronted by a tough policy challenge in a primary may wind up unprepared for that challenge in the fall, which of course is the moment when it matters most. Republicans, for example, may have found intra-party attacks on Mitt Romney's business career offensive; they are, after all, the party of the "builders". Democrats, as Romney should have remembered from his campaigns in Massachusetts, have no such compunctions. Democrats will not take kindly to criticism of pubic employee unions, which provide cash and foot soldiers for the party; a candidate too close to those unions should not be surprised to find herself under fire come Autumn.

How does this apply to She Who Must Always Be Named?

Much of the conversation has focused on potential challenges from the Left. Is Clinton too close to the Wall Street-Goldman Sachs wing of the Democratic Party? Does she need to distance herself from the deregulatory policies of the Bill Clinton years? Is she too hawkish for the activists who helped make her vote for the Iraq War so costly back in the 2008 campaign?

It would be even more helpful to her election prospects if she were confronted in the primary with questions more likely to be raised by the Republican nominee in the fall: was the Russian "reset" policy naive? Was it wise for the US to leave Iraq without even a residual force in place? What specific aspect of US foreign policy was changed for the better under her watch? Does she agree that the Affordable Care Act was offered to the public under false pretenses?

If these issues raise uncomfortable questions for Democrats, Clinton has reasons not to be too unsettled. She no doubt remembers that another candidate for President had to explain his break with many root assumptions that Democrats held about issues ranging from crime to trade to welfare. And that debate during the 1992 primaries worked out pretty well for the nominee.

Politico: "Mitch McConnell preps for 2016 battle"

By Manu Raju

November 24, 2014, 5:39 a.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Facing a daunting map, Republicans are already plotting ways to hang onto their new Senate majority.

Mitch McConnell spent years charting the Republican path back to power — and now he's already plotting to make sure they don't lose it.

The Kentucky Republican is quietly pushing his fellow Republican senators to beef up their political shops. He's considering a new super PAC that could spend millions on Senate races. And he's locking down operatives for another cycle who were key to GOP triumphs this month.

The under-the-radar moves less than three weeks after the 2014 midterms and a month-and-a-half before McConnell takes over for Harry Reid makes clear the brutal reality in front of Republicans: Their majority could be short lived.

Republicans face a daunting map in 2016, when they will be forced to defend 24 seats in a presidential year, while Democrats have to defend only 10 seats — a scenario McConnell is taking so seriously he's leaving nothing to chance, starting now.

"You can start too late, but never too soon," McConnell said in an interview in the Capitol hallways last week, citing the words of the late Happy Chandler, a former Kentucky senator turned commissioner of baseball.

Last week, McConnell summoned all 24 Republicans up for reelection in 2016 to a morning meeting at the National Republican Senatorial Committee, which was even attended by potential 2016 presidential candidates like Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, who has said he wouldn't run for the White House and Senate at the same time. At the meeting, McConnell and Mississippi Sen. Roger Wicker, the new NRSC chairman, made a blunt declaration to their colleagues: Reelection, they said, starts now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With the NRSC's new executive director, Ward Baker, and the deputy executive director, Kevin McLaughlin, the two GOP operatives made a presentation of how much campaigns have changed since the senators last ran in 2010, even noting iPhones were just a couple years old back then and iPads had just come on market. They implored their candidates to begin a heavy fundraising push immediately, and tried to tell them on what to expect in the ad war.

For instance, the GOP projected based on past trends that 83,000 radio and TV spots from the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee alone would air in all 2016 Senate races. And McConnell detailed how he shrewdly adjusted his tactics to pull off a resounding primary and general election victory for a sixth term in 2014.

In the 35-minute discussion, the GOP leaders and top operatives also urged Republican senators to immediately hire their own pollsters, consultants and staff, given there will be a major competition for operatives with the crowded 2016 GOP presidential primary about to take shape. If there are certain staff who need training, they said, the NRSC was prepared to help groom them.

"Members need to begin to do the things to tool their campaigns differently, to understand the significant change in resource needs," Sen. Richard Burr (R-N.C.) said, recounting the message from the meeting. "And now is the time to begin to think about the mechanics of the campaigns."

Burr, who is up for reelection for a third term in 2016, has just $720,000 in cash in a state where more than $100 million was spent in the 2014 North Carolina Senate race, in which Democratic Sen. Kay Hagan narrowly lost to Republican Thom Tillis. But despite the lack of money, Burr said he plans on running and even seemed ready to take on Hagan if she were to run against him.

"Repeats in North Carolina, historically, don't work too well," Burr said in an interview. "You have to ask yourself, how many people will write a check to somebody who just lost?"

In 2014, retirements became a major problem for Democrats, as they lost open seats vacated by retiring members in Montana, West Virginia and South Dakota. McConnell, a former NRSC chairman himself who has spent years studying campaigns in other states and spent an inordinate amount of time strategizing with NRSC officials this past cycle, is expected to eventually set a deadline for when lawmakers need to announce whether they will retire.

Illinois Sen. Mark Kirk, a freshman Republican who suffered a stroke in 2012 and travels around the Capitol in a wheelchair, said he was "doing everything possible" to prepare for a run and win potentially tough primary and general election races in 2016. Other potential retirees, like Indiana Sen. Dan Coats and Arizona Sen. John McCain, have also sent signals they are likely to run again, buoyed by the fact that they are no longer in the minority.

After last week's NRSC meeting, Wicker felt bullish.

"I don't expect any [GOP] retirements," Wicker said confidently in an interview. "I do not. I think we are excited about the chance to govern, the chance to legislate as the founders intended, I think there's a lot of enthusiasm, yes."

Donors, he said, are feeling much happier, and many have dumped big bucks early into the campaign accounts of Republican senators who have held a bevy of fundraisers at the NRSC since Election Day.

"People need to start to get prepared," said Texas Sen. John Cornyn, the No. 2 Senate Republican who attended the meeting.

The Republican path to keep the Senate won't be easy. They have to defend seats in blue states and swing states, like Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, Ohio, Florida, Illinois and Wisconsin — compared to just 10 for Democrats. Moreover, Democrats could have some serious statewide recruits. In recent interviews, two Democratic senators who lost this year — Arkansas' Mark Pryor and Alaska's Mark Begich — punted on their intentions to run in 2016 in their respective states, though they didn't rule it out.

"We'll see," Begich said when asked if he'd run against Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) in 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Plus, Hillary Clinton could end up at the top of the ballot if she decides to run and becomes the party's nominee, a scenario that could boost turnout, giving Democrats hope that they can increase the gender gap among women voters after seeing it shrink in 2014.

With Democratic turnout typically higher in an election year and a big-spending Democratic super PAC, Senate Majority PAC, prepared to dump tens of millions into the effort to bring its party back to the majority, McConnell is seeking more effective ways to spend GOPmoney.

Josh Holmes, McConnell's chief political adviser, is holding private conversations with donors and operatives to see if there's interest to form a new super PAC dedicated to helping Senate Republicans retain the majority. Currently, a bevy of big-spending GOP outside groups influence key races, including the Karl Rove-linked American Crossroads, as well as the Koch brothers' Americans for Prosperity. But in 2016, their attention may focus on the presidential race.

Plus, Holmes has identified at least $8 million spent by smaller super PACs on individual races in 2014 that Republicans believe could have been better spent this cycle.

Holmes declined to comment, but a decision on whether to create a specific Senate GOP super PAC is expected to be made by the first quarter of the year.

So far, Wicker said, GOP donors are feeling good.

"In 2012, we got off to a tough start because our donors were so discouraged that we actually lost ground in the Senate as well as the presidency," Wicker said. "We're now in an era of good feeling and our donors believe in us and we need to get started early."

One of the ways to instill confidence was to ensure there is continuity at the NRSC. McConnell sung the praises of Baker during the 2014 elections and pushed for him to stay. McLaughlin, a close friend of Holmes', was a key force in the GOP effort to train Republican candidates in 2014 and avoid the Todd Akin-like gaffes that doomed past Republican chances.

The NRSC team didn't wait until after November to begin pushing Republicans up in 2016 to get their campaigns in order. Since May, top NRSC officials have held three meetings with the chiefs of staff for all of the 24 Republican senators, including one right before the election. The No. 1 goal for the party, the GOP operatives said, is incumbent retention, something that Republicans recognize won't be easy in 2016.

"Obviously, I'm going to be the No. 1 target," said Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) when asked about his race for a second term. "I don't dispute that whatsoever."

Subject: [big campaign] New Huff Post from Creamer-Time to End the Threat of Nuclear Terrorism for Good

Post-Bin Laden - It Is Time to End the Threat of Nuclear Terrorism for Good

The death of Osama bin Laden eliminated the terrorist who most analysts believe was the most committed to -- and capable of -- obtaining and using a nuclear weapon.

But there is only one way to truly eliminate the threat of nuclear terrorism. America must be just as relentless in achieving President Obama's goal of eliminating nuclear weapons from the planet as we were in pursuing bin Laden.

Many "hardnosed" politicians and analysts consider the ideal of eliminating all nuclear weapons from the world to be "naive" or "utopian."

I recently returned from a seminar on nuclear policy in Vienna, Austria where presenters included some of the leading experts on the spread of nuclear weapons, nuclear power, nuclear disarmament and nuclear terrorism. I came away convinced that the term "naïve" could only be used to describe those who believe that we can continue to live in a world still bristling with nuclear weapons without endangering our very existence.

Last fall the Senate approved the New START arms control agreement with Russia that reduced each side's strategic nuclear arsenal to 1,550 nuclear war heads. That treaty represented a major step forward – following on the original START Treaty negotiated between President Ronald Reagan and Soviet Prime Minster Mikhail Gorbechev. But this agreement is only a down payment on the far more fundamental goal of completely ridding the world of all nuclear weapons.

Why is that goal so critical to our long-term survival?

All told there are 25,000 nuclear weapons currently in existence. Ninety percent of these are controlled by the United States and Russia. They include the strategic nuclear weapons that are now subject to the New START agreement, as well as thousands of tactical nuclear weapons that are intended to be used on the battlefield – and many non-deployed nuclear weapons that remain in storage and are not currently targeted at the bases and cities of an adversary.

The remainder are in the hands of the seven additional nuclear nations: China, Britain, France, Israel, India, Pakistan and North Korea. Currently China, Britain and France have hundreds of war heads each. Israel has 80 warheads. And North Korea has ten.

Notwithstanding the end of the Cold War almost twenty years ago, thousands of war heads remained on alert – targeted at bases and cities in Russia and the United States. From the time a radar-computer system gives one of the two sides warning of an impending attack, the other side has just minutes to decide if it should launch a counter attack or risk defeat and obliteration.

But that is far from the worst of it. Nuclear technology is now 65 years old. The skill and know-how to create a nuclear weapon is widespread. Increasing numbers of nations have sought to enter the nuclear club – most recently North Korea and potentially Iran.

An increasingly unstable regime in Pakistan controls a growing nuclear arsenal.

Worse, al Queda and other terrorist organizations have vowed to obtain and actually use nuclear weapons.

The status quo – the balance of terror – that for six decades prevented a nuclear war between the U.S. and Russia is every day being made more unstable by the increasing numbers of nuclear players – and by the potential entry of non-state actors. Far from being deterred by the chaos and human suffering that would ensue from nuclear war – actors like al Queda actively seek precisely that kind of cataclysm.

The more nuclear weapons that exist in the world – and more importantly the more weapons-grade fissile material that can be obtained to build a nuclear weapon – the more likely it is that one, or many more, will actually be used.

In the 1980's the specter of a "Nuclear Winter" helped spur the movement for nuclear arms reduction between the U.S. and Soviet Union. Studies showed that smoke caused by fires set off by nuclear explosions in cities and industrial sites would rise to the stratosphere and envelope the world.

The ash would absorb energy from the sun so that the earth's surface would get cold, dry and dark. Plants would die. Much of our food supply would disappear. Much of the world's surface would reach winter temperatures in the summer.

A recent study published in Scientific American by scientists Alan Robock and Owen Brian Toon -- using modern climatic computer models -- found that even a regional nuclear conflict between India and Pakistan would shroud the entire planet in a cloud of dust for 10 years and would massively diminish world food supply.

The fine dust particles from nuclear fires would rise into the stratosphere where there is no rain to clean the air. As a consequence it would take years to gradually settle to the earth's surface.

Their study assumed that India and Pakistan would each use 50 nuclear weapons. The total of 100 weapons used represents only .4% of the world's 25,000 nuclear weapons. It found that such a war would kill approximately 20 million people from the direct bomb effects and subsequent fires and radiation. Their model shows it would likely kill another 1 billion people – about a seventh of the world's population – from starvation caused by the agricultural collapse.

These effects would happen over a decade. You can imagine that those threatened with starvation would not die quietly. Rather the world would witness an economic and political crisis without any parallel in recorded history.

Robock and Toon tested their model against the actual the effects of volcanic eruptions such as those of Tambora in 1815, Krakatau in 1883 and Pinatubo in 1981. They found that their model replicated observed results. For instance, after the eruption of Pinatubo, sulfate aerosol clouds were carried around the world by winds. As a result global temperatures dropped by an average of .25 degrees Centigrade. In addition, global precipitation, river flow and soil moisture all decreased.

Mt. Tambora's eruption in Indonesia in 1815 was the worst volcanic eruption in 500 years. Dust from the eruption blocked the sun and caused global temperatures to drop by .5 Degrees Centigrade. 1816 was known as the "year without summer." In New England – thousands of miles from Indonesia – even though the average summer temperature dropped only a few degrees, crop-killing frosts happened in every summer month. After each frost, farmers replanted only to see their crops killed the next month.

They also tested their model against the actual firestorms created by the nuclear attacks on Nagasaki and Hiroshima, the fire bombing of Dresden, and the fires caused by the 1906 San Francisco earthquake. Each actual episode confirmed their result.

Finally, Robock and Toon point to archeological evidence that the collision of an asteroid with Yucatan 65 million years ago created a similar dust cloud that shrouded the earth and caused the extinction of the dinosaurs.

The Robock-Toon model found that smoke from the imaginary India-Pakistan regional nuclear war would cover every continent within two weeks and would continue to have massive impacts on the global climate for ten years.

The use of nuclear weapons in any part of the world would affect every living creature. Their use is simply unthinkable. Yet the United States and Russia maintain thousands on hair trigger alert. And terrorists who affirmatively desire to cause global Armageddon actively seek their use.

If someone looked back on our generation from the vantage point of a hundred years in the future, they would have a hard time imagining what we were thinking if we allowed the continued existence of weapons that we could never use without endangering our very existence.

That is precisely why a quartet of retired Cold Warriors: former Republican Secretaries of State Henry Kissinger and George Schultz, former Defense Secretary William Perry and former Georgia Senator Sam Nunn – have combined to sponsor a campaign to eliminate all nuclear weapons.

That's also why President Obama has renewed Ronald Reagan's often-forgotten call for a nuclear weapon free world.

Eliminating nuclear weapons will not be easy – and it must be done in a series of steps over a number of years. But there should be no doubt whatsoever that it must be humanity's goal.

Immediate steps include U.S. Senate ratification of the nuclear test ban treaty that would ban all future nuclear tests. The United States signed this treaty years ago, but it has yet to be approved by the Senate. As a practical matter, final U.S. approval is necessary in order to put this treaty into effect. In the short term, given the United State's enormous advantage in nuclear test data, this treaty would freeze in place a U.S. nuclear advantage. Yet it has been opposed by Neocons who want one day to create a new generation of nuclear weapons that they believe may need to be tested.

Our government should also begin a new round of arms reduction talks with the Russians. As a practical matter, non-nuclear states are simply unwilling to accept the view that they should forego the possession of nuclear weapons if the United States and Russia – which control 90% of all the nuclear weapons on the planet – do not meet their obligations under the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty to continuously reduce their stockpiles.

One of the central components of a strategy to achieve a nuclear weapon free world must be the negotiation of a new international treaty to control and prevent the new production of weapons-grade fissile materials. The know-how to create nuclear weapons will never disappear. But fissile materials – highly enriched uranium or plutonium – that can be used to create these weapons – can be controlled. Nuclear reactors used for peaceful purposes do not necessarily require weapons grade fissile material. Neither of these elements occurs in nature in a form usable to build nuclear weapons. Both must be created by human manufacturing processes that can be monitored and prevented with appropriate international agreements. Current weapons-grade fissile materials could be locked down under international control, and further production could be banned.

The elimination of nuclear weapons is certainly one of the most important issues on the human agenda.

A few years ago a planetary scientist named David Grinspoon wrote a book called, Lonely Planets. It explores the question of extraterrestrial life.

Toward the end of his book, Grinspoon speculates on the chances of survival for intelligent life in the universe. He argues that every civilization of intelligent creatures must pass through a gauntlet that tests whether the values and political structures of the society are capable of keeping pace with the exponentially increasing power of the society's technology. If its values and political structures can keep pace with technological change, the society may pass into a phase of enormous freedom and possibility. If it does not, the power of its own technology will destroy it. Perhaps, he postulates, civilizations are like seahorses. Many are born, but only a few survive.

For the first time, sixty-five years ago, human society entered that gauntlet. Our technological growth reached a point of takeoff that for the first time gave us the power to destroy ourselves and all life on our tiny, fragile planet. From that moment on, the race was on.

The next several generations of humans will decide how that race turns out. We won't simply observe it, or describe it; we will decide it. Whatever the future holds will be a result of human decision for which we are all responsible.

We will decide if we pass through that gauntlet or – like our cousins the Neanderthals – become evolutionary dead ends. We will decide if humanity passes into a new era of possibility and freedom – or the human story simply ends.

Bloomberg: "Hillary Clinton to Headline United Nations Women's Conference"

By Jennifer Epstein

February 19, 2015, 4:41 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] A month of women-centric events begins next week.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton will address a major United Nations gathering on women's rights next month, just as the Clinton Foundation releases a major report on women and girls more than a year in the making.

Clinton is scheduled to be the keynote speaker on March 10 at the Women's Empowerment Principles gathering in New York. The gathering will mark the 20th anniversary of the Beijing Platform for Action, which came out of a major UN conference on women's issues.

Clinton "will reflect on progress made in implementing the agenda set in Beijing two decades ago" and share findings from the foundation's "No Ceilings: The Full Participation Report," WEP said. She will also "outline an agenda to accelerate the full participation of women and girls around the world."

The report's release, set for March 9, and the speech will come in the midst of a month of women-centric events for Clinton. On Tuesday, she's headed to the Lead On Watermark Silicon Valley Conference for Women, where she will be interviewed by technology journalist Kara Swisher. On March 3, she will be honored at EMILY's List's 30th anniversary gala and given the We Are EMILY Award, which is given to "extraordinary women who have made a significant impact on our nation through their consistent leadership and inspiration" to the group.

Clinton is also set to keynote the March 23 awards ceremony for the Toner Prize for Excellence in Political Reporting, given in memory of the late New York Times political reporter Robin Toner.

Neither the Clinton Foundation, which has hosted the "No Ceilings" project, nor Clinton's spokesman responded to requests for comment.

[Subtitle:] They were instrumental in determining elections during the 90s—and will play a key role in 2016.

Hillary Clinton simply meant to respond to anti-vaxers when she wrote the following tweet.

Sec. Hillary Rodham Clinton @HillaryClinton: The science is clear: The earth is round, the sky is blue, and #vaccineswork . Let's protect all our kids. #GrandmothersKnowBest [2/2/15, 10:45 p.m. EST]

The reaction was instantaneous. #GrandmothersKnowBest became a trending hashtag, drawing cheers and sneers, leaving pundits to wonder if it was indicative of a larger strategy in the much-rumored Clinton campaign to distract from her age as a potential flaw and, instead, deploy it as a strength.

What Clinton's tweet actually showed was the power of grandmothers as an American voting bloc—a fact that might not come as a surprise to anyone who's taken an Intro to Government class. After all, the senior-citizen segment of the population reliably goes to the polls come rain or shine, and is heavily invested in the outcome of elections.

But unlike Hillary, the average first-time grandmother isn't yet a senior citizen. Clinton, at 67, is far older than most first-time grandmothers in the United States, whose average age hovers around 50. These grandmothers aren't driven by Social Security, Medicare, or other issues of concern to voters over the age of 65.

Say hello to the Boomer Grannies.

These grandmothers are, as the name suggests, baby boomers, part of a generation that was born between mid-1946 and mid-1964. The oldest boomers turn 70 next year, but the majority of boomers aren't going to be eligible for retirement benefits until closer to 2030. Within this population of middle-aged boomers, women outnumber men.

Boomer Grannies transformed gender norms—by being the first in their families to get bachelor's degrees, earning the majority of college degrees in their generation; working outside the home; raising children, often singlehandedly; and revolutionizing the concepts of modern motherhood and feminism.

This generation of grandmas is more hip than the crocheting, bingo-playing, anti-technology stereotype would suggest. They're too young—and perhaps, too cynical—to rely on classic social-welfare programs that drive the older vote, but they are nevertheless invested in issues affecting their children and grandchildren.

It makes a certain amount of sense that the soccer moms of yore are making a reappearance as a key voting bloc. Boomer Grannies are more world-weary than gracious, more educated than docile; their concern for posterity extends beyond the traditional "maternal" interests of education and healthcare. Today, these grandmas are just as interested in the implications of foreign-conflict intervention and tax reform as they are in paid leave and anti-poverty initiatives.

Clinton's status as a frontrunner in the potential Democratic Presidential field has excited this very demographic, to her advantage. After all, these aging soccer moms are comfortable with a Clinton in the White House. Boomer Grannies greet the former Secretary of State like a rockstar, and often convey that somehow, Clinton "gets" them.

Part of this cohort's grandmotherly concern for posterity may have to do with its shared experience of parenthood itself, says Laurel Elder, a professor of political science at Hartwick College who, along with Steven Greene at North Carolina State University, has published the only study of how being a mom affects choices at the ballot box.

"We've found very consistent motherhood effects," she told me. "Even when you're controlling for other variables, motherhood predicts more liberal attitudes. Being a mom makes you more supportive on government spending on education and daycare and on a whole range of social-welfare issues: spending on the elderly, spending on the poor, overall government services."

But do these effects continue when the kids those moms raised leave the house? That's a complicated and under-explored question. Elder said that "even mothers of grown children are more liberal." Members of this younger generation of grandmothers are still concerned about posterity, but are also committed to advancing their own interests, prioritizing women's workplace issues like equal pay and paid leave.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In general, parents skew conservative on both social and fiscal issues as they age. But this generation of grandparents has experienced a crushing recession that has affected both them and their children, and might retain its liberal tilt longer. That would impact the presidential race.

Surprisingly little attention has been devoted to the political power of Boomer Grannies, and perhaps it's because they are often clumped together with senior citizens. But the age structure of this country is changing rapidly—the average age of first-time mothers has crept up to about 27. While women of all ages may provide a huge advantage to Clinton, should she run for the White House, it's the women sharing Clinton's grandma experience that offer significant, tantalizing voting power.

Complicating the story of Boomer Grannies is the aftermath of the recession. Many grown children are returning home and relying on these grandmothers for financial and emotional support as they navigate a changed working world. One in 10 American children is living with a grandparent, with a third of those kids counting their grandparents as their primary caretakers. Poverty is often an issue in households headed by grandmas. Young adults living at home for longer are changing not only family dynamics and household finances, but also the standard model of the nuclear family.

To be sure, having a grown child doesn't necessarily mean that a middle-aged mother is a grandparent. But the liberal tilt of the soccer mom generation that put Bill Clinton into the White House during the 90s brings up a pertinent question for Republicans: Does the GOP have any prospect of capturing this slice of America?

National Journal's Next America series found that the traditional Republican strongholds of Nevada, Colorado, and New Mexico are weakening. Romney gave up on New Mexico in 2012, despite the state having a Republican governor. Analysts point to the increasing Hispanic populations in this trio of Southwestern states, contending for power with older, white voters. Hispanic voters are increasingly vocal in politics, and tend to disagree with older voters when it comes to immigration policy, welfare programs, and economics—a phenomenon that has become known as the "brown vs. gray."

Increasing diversity, however, may not help the Democrats as much as they hope: A report from the Census Bureau notes that "The race and ethnic composition of the baby boom population reflects the composition of the U.S. population during the mid-twentieth century—the years when these cohorts were born." American baby boomers are overwhelmingly white, with 72 percent of the population identifying as non-Hispanic White. With baby boomers becoming a more female dominated group as the years pass by, that means the exact type of voter that will become crucial come 2016 is a white, educated, working, middle-aged woman.

That doesn't mean candidates should simply forget about black, Asian, and Hispanic middle-aged women—doing so would be a strategic error. But the more diverse young voters in these states are less likely to turn out for elections, making it possible that older white voters may still secure these states for Republicans come 2016.

Boomer Grannies, on the cusp of becoming senior citizens, are confronting a fragile future with a hazy forecast on Social Security: President Barack Obama's administration has taken the stance of many Democrats in shifting Social Security's trust funds to avoid slashes in disability payments, but Republicans have characterized this as "kicking the can down the road," urging Democrats to consider a more immediate solution for baby boomers now verging on retirement.

The recession has significantly altered the working lives of Boomer Grannies, who have often turned out to be the sole breadwinners for their families as they struggle to pay bills. Obama's State of the Union speech devoted a significant amount of time to the plight of the American working woman, but the method of doing so by raising taxes irked Republicans, who saw this as an unnecessary step and potentially harmful to the country's cautious economic improvement.

These rifts in policy are promising for a party that has struggled to capture the votes of older women. Republicans saw a glimmer of hope in the last presidential election, when Obama did shockingly poorly among college-educated white women, a surprising fact given that both college-educated voters and women tend to favor Democrats.

Early polls from a set of Quinnipiac surveys indicate that Clinton enjoys overwhelming support among college-educated white women. But she cannot take much comfort in that lead. "In 2012, Obama lost ground with them, falling back to 46 percent nationally, the weakest performance for any Democratic nominee since Michael Dukakis in 1988," wrote Ronald Brownstein in National Journal.

Even the subset of Boomer Grannies who identify as Democrats may split. Senator Elizabeth Warren, who most recently denied any interest in running for President, maintains strong support among this very demographic. Warren's experiences as a baby-boomer mother who has fought financial institutions and Congress in the name of working women means she will have strong support among Boomer Grannies, no matter how many times she says she's not running. And to Warren's advantage? She's a grandma, too.

So did Hillary Clinton simply stumble on a demographic that she is uniquely poised to attract? Or does she have a team of strategic consultants who have taken her time on the campaign trail in 2008 to heart and combined with the big data-targeted, get-out-the-vote aggression of Barack Obama? It's probably a mix of both.

If the Boomer Granny postulate proves anything, it's this: Whoever runs for president from either party will need to reach out not just to middle America and undecided voters, but also to the middle-aged women formerly known as soccer moms.

Bloomberg: "Missouri's Senate Race, and the (Possible) Return of the Clinton Coattails"

By David Weigel

February 19, 2015, 2:30 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Why Democrats scored a Senate candidate in a red state.

Jason Kander, Missouri's 33-year old secretary of state, has given Democrats that rarest of post-2014 feelings: Enthusiasm about a red state race. He's running for U.S. Senate against first-term Senator Roy Blunt, a Republican who left a safe House seat to win office in the 2010 Tea Party wave. (He defeated the previous Democratic secretary of state, Robin Carnahan.) "Barely halfway through his first term as secretary of state and Democrat Jason Kander is already bored with his job," thundered the National Republican Senatorial Committee, which in 2012 supported Ohio's 35-year-old Josh Mandel, and in 2014 supported Arkansas's 35-year-old Tom Cotton.

What could make Kander seek higher office in a state that rejected the Obama-Biden ticket by 9.5 points in 2012? This is easy: the next Democratic ticket is likely to be led by Hillary Clinton. Kander's move should be seen as the latest burst of red state Democratic enthusiasm about the return of the Clintons. In the large swath of red America where white voters preferred Clinton to Obama in 2008, many Democrats see the Clinton restoration as the removal of a heavy anchor. Bill Clinton twice won Missouri, West Virginia, Arkansas, and Kentucky–all states lost by Obama. Even if Hillary Clinton can't repeat that, Democrats hope her brand will alienate fewer voters than the toxic Obama brand.

"It's much easier to convince people to run," said Kentucky Speaker of the House Greg Stumbo, a Democrat whose colleagues held on to control in the rough 2014 elections even as Senator Mitch McConnell was winning a landslide re-election. "Even some of the ones that were talking about retiring–they're kind of giddy. They were tired of getting beat up in some of these races."

In 2008, Clinton absolutely pulverized Obama in Kentucky's late primary, taking 66 percent of the vote even after the Illinois Democrat was clearly about to secure the nomination. Obama actually defeated Clinton in Missouri (helped by the early and aggressive support of Senator Claire McCaskill), but he did so by taking only six of the state's 114 counties. Since then, Missouri Democrats had two rough midterms and a 2012 saved by the black swan gaffe-ability of the Republicans' Senate candidate, Todd Akin. Kander, like Democratic gubernatorial candidate Chris Koster, is looking for a way for a post-Obama Democratic Party to rebuild as much of the old Clinton coalition as voters allow.

New York Times blog: The Upshot: "Hillary Clinton and Inevitability: This Time Is Different"

By Nate Cohn

February 19, 2015

Whenever I mention that Hillary Clinton is an overwhelming favorite for the Democratic nomination — and would be even if Senator Elizabeth Warren ran — the conversation usually comes back to 2008. “She was supposed to be inevitable last time,” the refrain goes, “and she lost.”

I get it. I remember that Mrs. Clinton was “inevitable,” and I see why today’s discussions of Mrs. Clinton’s strength sound familiar.

But there is no equivalence between Mrs. Clinton’s strength then and now. She was never inevitable eight years ago. If a candidate has ever been inevitable — for the nomination — it is Mrs. Clinton today.

She was certainly a strong candidate in 2008. But by this time in that cycle, it was already clear that she would not cruise to the nomination. Yes, she held an impressive 40 percent or so of the Democratic vote in national polls, leading Senator Barack Obama by 15 points. That, however, is not inevitability.

Candidates with a case for inevitability — the ones who started as big favorites and won the nomination without a long fight, like Al Gore and George W. Bush in 2000 and Bob Dole in 1996 — all held at least 50 percent of the vote in early polls, and led their opposition by enormous margins. The record of candidates with similar standing to Mrs. Clinton, like Gerald Ford in 1976 or Ted Kennedy in 1980, is not at all perfect. Kennedy lost, and Ford faced a protracted contest.

Flash-forward to 2015. No candidate, excluding incumbent presidents, has ever fared so well in the early primary polls as Mrs. Clinton. She holds about 60 percent of the vote of Democratic voters, a tally dwarfing the 40 percent she held this time in the last election cycle.

If anything, in the 2008 cycle the national polls overstated Mrs. Clinton’s strength. She trailed in Iowa polls from the very start. She led in New Hampshire and South Carolina only by single digits, making it easy to imagine how the winner of Iowa could gain momentum and go on to defeat her in following contests.

Her vulnerabilities were obvious. Her vote to authorize the war in Iraq was a serious liability; so were reservations about another Clinton in the White House. Unlike Mr. Bush, Mr. Gore or Mr. Dole, Mrs. Clinton faced two top-tier challengers, the former vice-presidential nominee John Edwards and Mr. Obama, a rising star thanks in part to his speech at the 2004 Democratic National Convention.

Mr. Obama had already declared his candidacy by this time in 2007. He had surged to 25 percent in the polls. Enthusiastic crowds showed up to early rallies in Austin, Tex., and Oakland, Calif. He matched Mrs. Clinton in fund-raising in the first quarter, demonstrating strong support in the so-called invisible primary — the behind-the-scenes competition for the resources and credibility necessary to win the nomination.

She was also running against a bevy of competent, second-tier candidates like Gov. Bill Richardson of New Mexico, Senator Christopher Dodd of Connecticut and the current vice president, Joe Biden, then a Delaware senator. The decision of these candidates to run was a telling indication that they considered Mrs. Clinton to be far more vulnerable than the inevitability narrative suggested.

This analysis is not just based on the benefit of hindsight. The betting markets concurred at the time, with Intrade giving Mrs. Clinton just a 49 percent chance of winning the nomination on Feb. 14, 2007. Mr. Obama had a 20 percent chance of winning the nomination, according to Intrade, or about the same as Jeb Bush today.

Writing for the Week in Review section of The New York Times in April 2007, Adam Nagourney argued that “any hope she had of Democrats embracing her candidacy as inevitable has been dashed” by the strength of Mr. Obama and Mr. Edwards, and “obvious discomfort in some Democratic quarters of putting another Clinton in the White House.”

Eight years later, though, it’s clear that it’s still possible for a candidate to approach inevitability, and it is Mrs. Clinton who, in a twist, deserves the distinction.

Her nearest historical rival, Al Gore in 2000, was a sitting vice president serving under a popular incumbent in a booming economy. Mrs. Clinton’s lead comes despite the fact that the sitting vice president is one of the potential candidates who is included in the polls.

She leads the person in second place in those polls, Ms. Warren, by more than 40 points, not 15 points. Just as important, her leads in the early states, like Iowa, South Carolina and New Hampshire, are similar in size.

Even as Mrs. Clinton enters the season in a far better position than eight years ago, her potential opposition is weaker as well. So far, it's basically nonexistent: Not a single sitting senator, governor or vice president has decided to run. Mr. Biden has made noises about running, but he has no obvious base of support among Democratic donors or voters.

The fact that Mrs. Clinton seems poised to clear the field is the surest evidence that 2016 is not 2008. It means that Ms. Warren is getting a very different message from the one Mr. Obama received when Senator Harry Reid reportedly urged him to seek the presidency. Instead, many of the first people to endorse Mr. Obama in 2008, like Senator Claire McCaskill of Missouri, have already endorsed Mrs. Clinton.

Even if Ms. Warren did run, it is hard to argue that she is as strong as Mr. Obama was eight years ago. Not only is it a stretch to compare the enthusiasm for Ms. Warren to that for Mr. Obama, but the differences between her and Mrs. Clinton on inequality and finance are also less clear — and probably less salient — than Mrs. Clinton's vote to authorize the war in Iraq. Ms. Warren won't replicate Mr. Obama's support among black voters, either, and it is hard to see how she would make up for it.

Perhaps, then, the easiest way to think about Mrs. Clinton's strength is simply to remember just how close she came to victory in 2008. Despite her vote to authorize the war in Iraq, despite the strength of Mr. Obama's candidacy, despite a four-to-one disadvantage among black voters, and despite all the miscues of her campaign, Mrs. Clinton still won 48 percent of pledged delegates.

Without these powerful forces working against her, she appears to be far better positioned than she was eight years ago. If she barely lost then, why would she lose now?

Washington Post blog: Erik Wemple: "Hillary Clinton aide Philippe Reines praises on-the-record communications"

By Erik Wemple

February 19, 2015, 6:58 p.m. EST

Philippe Reines is a long, longtime media aide to Hillary Clinton. He's known for a number of things, including some amazing sound bites: "Is it possible to be quoted yawning?" for instance. And as noted in a Washington Post profile, he developed an "addiction to background dish," which is to say he'd plant nameless quotes with material-hungry reporters, the better to help his boss and hinder her detractors. In an October 2006 column, the New York Times's Maureen Dowd quoted a Clinton "adviser" as saying that Sen. John McCain looked "similar to the way he did on those captive tapes from Hanoi where he recited the names of his crew mates."

It later came out that the "adviser" was Reines.

Many years later, Reines is on the record praising on-the-record journalism. In a piece written by Emily Schultheis for the National Journal, Reines laments that anonymous individuals claiming to possess knowledge about Clinton's presidential plans and ambitions are sending incorrect information into the public realm via all-too-willing reporters. The key passage:

"Asked how the campaign could get a handle on all the anonymous outside chatter, Reines placed much of the blame on the media for being willing to grant anonymity to sources who don't know what they're talking about. Unless the unnamed 'advisers' stop talking to reporters, or reporters stop quoting them, Reines added, there's no way to get the issue under control.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"'What gets lost is, there are no consequences for [the source or the media] when they're wrong—there just aren't,' he said. 'If you were to go back and look at the last three, four, five, six months of coverage about Secretary Clinton, you're going to see certain reporters who cover her closely whose accuracy rate is less than 50-50.'"

So who are these reporters? Where are the innaccuracies? Reached on that matter, Reines wrote the Erik Wemple Blog via e-mail: "[Y]ou don't need me, you only need The Google to determine what has been introduced into the public domain that has proven to be on the money and what has been off by a mile. Because if I do it, it gets dumbed down to 'Hating the Media' — as opposed to hating bogus information."

Challenge accepted: The Erik Wemple Blog will bang on Google tonight in search of erroneous Clinton coverage.

Now to the question of Reines passing judgement on anonymous sourcing. Here, Reines provides a spirited and even logical defense of his position. There's a difference, he argues, between anonymous quotes from people who don't know what they're talking about and anonymous quotes from people who do know what they're talking about. "[W]hat the National Journal story was specifically looking at was sources, identified in a manner implying they know their a%@ from their elbow, spewing nonsense — all in between quotation marks. That practice lends a great deal of legitimacy to the information and sentiment presented."

That circumstance, argues Reines, differs from past situations in which he himself just might have issued comments on background or off-record: "And when I spoke to you or anyone else — on any basis — I'm guessing you didn't question or doubt that I was in fact a duly authorized spokesman paid to speak to the media. That's the fundamental difference. You wanted me on the record because it's always better and sexier for a reporter to have a name attached to something — especially if the name is legit. But that's a different animal and not what the story was addressing."

Reines seemed quite pleased with the National Journal piece.

As for Reines's own leanings these days, they tend toward transparency. When asked whether he'd moved to a more consistent on-the-record platform, Reines replied, "[Y]es, while I am no longer in daily contact with reporters — for their well being as much as mine since from everything I read I am an unhelpful & profane meanie — when I rarely do I try to be on the record as much as possible. Mostly because it's a forcing mechanism to abide by the rule that if you don't have anything nice to say about someone, don't say anything. But it's an easy goal to adhere to when you barely take press calls." Schultheis declined to comment on whether Reines went off-record in their conversations.

The glory of Reines's comments in National Journal is seeing an operative going on the record to criticize allies who feel close to his boss in all likelihood because of the political acumen of his boss: That is, some of the Clinton "allies" quoted in stories these days ID themselves as such because the Clintons make them feel that way. Reines, again, has quite a response:

"There are a dozen reasons to explain the problem that don't equate to the source or the reporter being bad actors. But in the case you're describing below, the implication is that they are in regular contact as a basis for their knowledge. So why would you identify someone as an advisor or something equivalent that implies regular and direct contact and participation when that's not the truth? People aren't identified as 'Spoke recently to X after seeing them for the first time in a year at a book party they both attended.' They are identified as friends or insiders. 'Friend' 'supporter' 'close to' and 'ally' are especially silly. By implication they are NOT an advisor or in the know, or you'd call them an advisor! Yet their information is presented as gospel."

Below is Reines unabridged, the way he should be. In #1, he answers the question about alleged inaccuracies in the media about Clintonworld; in #2, he riffs about his historical relationship with sourcing bases:

"On #1, you don't need me, you only need The Google to determine what has been introduced into the public domain that has proven to be on the money and what has been off by a mile. Because if I do it, it gets dumbed down to 'Hating the Media' — as opposed to hating bogus information. Two very different things. It should be ok to not be a fan of bad and misleading information. And reporters (and their editors and publishers) should hate inaccuracy as much as we do. But somehow hating inaccuracy has become synonymous with hating the media.

"On #2, the story wasn't about the general propriety or usefulness of OTR or background conversations. It was about sources being portrayed as being something they are not, and the resulting inaccuracy of their information. And not the moments of being off the record since strictly speaking, if a source wants to be completely off the record, that's between them the reporter and the almighty since by the book what's said can't used. So what the National Journal story was specifically looking at was sources, identified in a manner implying they know their a%@ from their elbow, spewing nonsense — all in between quotation marks. That practice lends a great deal of legitimacy to the information and sentiment presented. In those cases — where a source's standing is in question but they won't allow their name to be attached to their comments — it's the reporter who is being put at risk, not the source. And to be more cynical, I bet there are instances where the reporter knows full well that using the name wouldn't exactly wow anyone or convey credibility and is more than happy sticking with anonymity. For as long as there are no consequences to either source or reporter, this will continue. Why there are no consequences to the reporter is hard to understand. If a reporter had a two-a-day correction rate, they'd probably get a talking to. But relying on bad sourcing five-times-a-week that is immediately or quickly exposed as clearly being bad? You're the media expert, you tell me how often people have been admonished as a result. To the reader, there's zero evidence that happens. And if it happens, doesn't the reader deserve to know the same way they do if a noun was misspelled? Arguably nitpicky mistakes are far less reflective of someone's overall credibility and more a reflection of spellcheck

"And when I spoke to you or anyone else — on any basis — I'm guessing you didn't question or doubt that I was in fact a duly authorized spokesman paid to speak to the media. That's the fundamental difference. You wanted me on the record because it's always better and sexier for a reporter to have a name attached to something — especially if the name is legit. But that's a different animal and not what the story was addressing. Besides, at the end of most interactions with you, you had something on the record from me encapsulating our larger conversation. Obviously you agree there are times it is acceptable practice to speak on a basis other than on the record or you wouldn't agree to doing so what I'm guessing is five times a day. People also need to remember that a reason for not being 100% on the record is because the reporter is only going use 1% due to space constraints. Which puts a lot of pressure on the speaker to make sure the point they are trying to make gets across, rather than some errant clause or snarky comment – which by the way reporters make too but don't have to read in print. It's only human. If reporters offered to use 100% of our comments on the record and include a transcript of the conversation — both sides, I bet spokespeople would take that offer more often than not. Definitely more often than you think. And I bet far more often than reporters would want to see their half of the conversation transcribed and in print. But that's not the case. A conversation that is 100% on the record means you at most see 50% of the exchange. You don't know what triggered the 1%, there might not be adequate context. So it's not like a subject being 100% on the record provides 100% context and transparency to the reader.

"So you shouldn't conflate your wanting to have a conversation that's 100% on the record with everyone you speak to with this National Journal story. It's authorized apples vs misleading oranges.

"And yes, while I am no longer in daily contact with reporters — for their well being as much as mine since from everything I read I am an unhelpful & profane meanie— when I rarely do I try to be on the record as much as possible. Mostly because it's a forcing mechanism to abide by the rule that if you don't have anything nice to say about someone, don't say anything. But it's an easy goal to adhere to when you barely take press calls.

"With that I am going to conclude my Norma Rae like call to action on the factory floor and return to quarantine."

Washington Post blog: The Fix: "The GOP's dilemma with Hillary Clinton: What to attack?"

By Nia-Malika Henderson

February 19, 2015, 4:15 p.m. EST

Hillary Rodham Clinton's nearly quarter-century span on the national political scene is an opposition researcher's dream. And the "Hillary Haters," as Hanna Rosin calls them in her Atlantic piece, are already busy and are more well-funded than ever.

Their goal is do to something Republicans have never done before: Defeat the Clintons, once and for all.

But that massive opposition file also begs a question Republicans in all these years haven't been able to answer: Which Hillary to run against? There are so many to choose from, with gender roles and expectations undergirding each one.

There is first lady Clinton, with a scandal always around the corner (Vince Foster, Whitewater, Monica Lewinsky and more). How about carpet-bagging Senator Clinton? Also, presidential candidate Clinton, the one that "misspoke" about arriving under sniper fire in Bosnia and lost the primary? And/or Secretary of State Clinton -- as in Benghazi, Benghazi and more Benghazi? There's also Alinsky Clinton and Arkansas Clinton. Oh, and scorned-but-scheming wife Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There are so many versions that it's hard to keep track. But the damning through-line is missing -- or, at least, not yet evident. There's no Swift Boat or "47 percent" hook just yet, despite all that material.

The most recent attempt is to make Clinton into some version of Romney -- an opportunistic plutocrat scoring huge sums of money for just standing up and saying words to the ultimate benefit of the morass that is the Clinton Foundation and her own political career.

But even that has problems.

Rosin writes:

“That said, if clumsily executed, the Hillary-as-plutocrat offense could easily summon a different set of stereotypes about how unseemly money and power look on a woman. The stories on America Rising’s Web site may stick to the facts, but much of the accompanying art is in the realm of tabloid cheap shot. When photos of Clinton appear on the group’s home page, she is almost always wearing one of a few unflattering expressions: chin up haughtily, angry and finger-pointing, bored and contemptuous, or laughing with her mouth wide open. In one photo, accompanying the aggregated story about billing taxpayers for her book tour, she seems to be rubbing her hands together as she leaves the stage.”

Running successfully against Clinton means taking her strength and turning it into a weakness. In 2008, she ran as the most experienced candidate, betting that the Clinton brand was a good one. The Obama campaign punctured the experience argument and made the Clinton brand seem stale using the Iraq war. And they both canceled out the historic-first-xxxxxx president argument.

And it's this argument that could be one of Clinton's strengths this time. The woman factor even blunts the age factor; a CNN poll this week showed a surprising number of people think Clinton embodies the future -- more so than any of the other candidates, at least.

Which is what makes finding that silver-bullet, focus-messaging campaign so hard for Republicans. As Rosin reports, consultants are busy at work trying to find the right mix, which might be somewhere between "too political" and "plutocrat." Yet being a too-political plutocrat could also be read by some as Clinton beating the boys at their own game.

Strategists and consultants in the Clinton branding sweepstakes are particularly focused on white-collar white women, the very voters who would likely identify with Clinton in some ways and could turn out in higher numbers. Getting those women to see less of themselves in Clinton's run -- in one way or another -- will likely be key whatever they the opposition chooses to focus on.

Boston Herald: “Elizabeth Warren keeps silence on Hill: ‘Way too early’”

By Matt Stout

February 20, 2015

GREENFIELD — Massachusetts U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren, who huddled with former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton just weeks ago, repeatedly ducked questions about whether she’ll back the likely 2016 Democratic presidential nominee, telling a Herald reporter it’s “way too early.”

“She hasn’t declared!” Warren said after a series of events in western Massachusetts. Pressed if she’d support Clinton if and when she does launch a White House campaign, Warren continued playing hard to get.

“You’re way too early,” she said. “You’re way too early.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Warren, the de facto leader of the party's liberal wing, has repeatedly ignored calls to launch her own campaign, and again yesterday twice repeated, "I'm not running for president." She has instead continued slamming Wall Street and touting a populist message that has helped catapult her into the Democrats' leadership team.

"I want to make sure the progressive point of view is heard and fully understood and that people are ready to act on it," Warren said at a Northampton fire house. "That's my job."

Warren also discussed her private meeting in December with Clinton in Washington, D.C., characterizing it as a "policy discussion."

"And I'm never shy about my point of view on working families. Never," Warren said of their talk.

Clinton and Warren crossed paths at a Boston fundraiser for Democrat Martha Coakley last fall, where the former first lady had high praise for the Bay State senator, and even tried to out-populist her, saying, "Corporations don't create jobs." That comment, which echoed a similar one by Warren in 2011, drew immediate fire and Clinton ended up walking it back.

Ready for Warren campaign manager Erica Sagrans kept up the drumbeat last night, issuing a statement saying: "Our message to Senator Warren is this: 'When you're ready to run, we'll be ready to help you fight back. This movement is about more than getting others to believe in you. It's about getting you to believe in us. Our future is too important to miss this moment — Senator Warren, this is your time.'"

Democratic consultant Peter Fenn said Warren is wise to "keep her powder dry" and withhold her endorsement.

"I don't think she is playing it cute. I think she is playing smart," Fenn said. "I think the more that she feels that she is having influence on the Clinton candidacy, the better it will be for the country. That is clearly her view."

Warren was greeted like a rock star during yesterday's three-city swing. Roughly 150 people packed a Greenfield Community College library to hear her talk student loans, education and even fracking. Warren also told reporters she agrees "with the Anti-Defamation League" that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's March address to Congress should be postponed, though she didn't say whether she would attend.

"What Speaker (John) Boehner did by trying to politicize (this) ... he has tried to turn our relationship with Israel into Republicans vs. Democrats," Warren said, "and I don't think that's good for the United States, and certainly not good for Israel."

Fox News: "Clinton-tied firm accused of illegal 'scheme' to boost Dem groups, candidates"

By Kelley Beaucar Vlahos

February 20, 2015

A Democrat-aligned business founded by a longtime Clinton confidant is being accused of giving valuable voter lists to party committees and candidates, as part of a "scheme" that allegedly runs afoul of campaign finance law.

The charges were detailed in a new complaint filed by the Foundation for Accountability and Civic Trust (FACT), a conservative watchdog group, on Wednesday. They implicate Catalist, LLC., a for-profit company that has provided customized voter data to hundreds of labor unions, Democratic committees and candidates -- including the Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama campaigns in 2008.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The complaint, filed to the Federal Election Commission, accused the group of effectively masquerading as a corporation while acting like a political action committee -- in turn, skirting campaign finance laws that normally apply to PACs.

“Fundamentally, I would call [Catalist] a scheme to avoid campaign finance law,” FACT director Matthew Whitaker, a former U.S. attorney, told FoxNews.com.

The complaint accuses the group, whose investors include George Soros, of skirting laws that cover so-called “soft money” -- donations from corporations, unions, and individuals used to influence elections -- and coordination between independent groups like PACs and the parties and candidates they support.

The complaint says “the commission should examine whether Catalist was established, and/or is financed, maintained or controlled, by the [Democratic National Committee], and is therefore” subject to campaign finance laws.

Sitting atop Catalist is founder and president Harold Ickes, a stalwart aide and adviser to both former President Bill Clinton and Hillary Clinton -- who is preparing for a likely presidential run in 2016. A member of the Democratic National Committee (DNC) rules and bylaws committee, Ickes “has played an ongoing and significant role in the DNC and in Clinton presidential campaigns,” according to the complaint.

Whitaker, in making the case that Catalist is not a corporation but in fact a political group subject to campaign finance law, said the organization is funded by and caters to donors and groups responsible for over $100 million in outside spending to elect Democrats. He said this makes the group an arm of the Democratic Party.

Federal parties were completely banned from raising and spending "soft money" in 2004. PACs and other groups like 527s can still raise unlimited amounts of soft money, but they cannot coordinate directly with campaigns or political parties. Whitaker says as a “corporation,” Catalist investors and clients can engage in “seamless coordination” and other activities that PACs, 527s and parties cannot. In addition, wealthy donors like Soros, who has invested millions in Catalist since 2006, are not subject to FEC disclosure laws.

The complaint also says the group sold voter lists at a discount, which would count as an in-kind contribution for a PAC.

Requests to Catalist for comment were not returned.

Groups like Catalist -- including from the conservative end of the spectrum -- have raised eyebrows before. Last fall, the American Democracy Legal Fund, a Democratic watchdog, filed a similar complaint against Data Trust, a private company launched to provide voter information between the Republican National Committee and outside groups.

Politico: “DNC members unfazed by Hillary Clinton stories”

But count the most committed Democratic party officials as unperturbed by — and in many cases unaware of – the fallout.

At the Democratic National Committee's winter meeting on Thursday, attendees unanimously expressed indifference to the spate of bad news. Instead, the only point of disagreement was whether a competitive presidential primary was desirable for the party, though attendees expressed confidence that Clinton would be prepared regardless, drawing on circus metaphors to describe the boisterous Republican field vying to take on the former secretary of state.

Earlier this month, the New York Times reported on a fundraiser for pro-Clinton organizations that charges a commission, a controversial practice in politics. Last week, Clinton loyalist David Brock resigned from the board of Priorities USA, a pro-Clinton super PAC, saying its leaders had planted the Times story to undermine his pro-Clinton groups. Then, POLITICO reported that Priorities was having trouble meeting fundraising goals, in part because other Clinton groups were tapping out donors. Finally, this week, the Wall Street Journal reported that the Clinton Foundation had ended its policy of declining to accept gifts from foreign governments, raising questions about the appearance of undue influence on Clinton.

But the stories have apparently done little to penetrate Democratic leaders' confidence. "Even among the group of people who are prone to anxiety attacks, I have not been getting phone calls," said Roy Temple, chairman of the Missouri Democratic Party. "I pay a lot more attention to the fundamentals than I do to day-to-day dramas."

"Things that are happening today are going to have no impact in November 2016," said Alan Clendenin, vice chair of the Florida Democratic Party, who sported a Clinton pin on his lapel.

"We listen to that chatter, but we don't necessarily let it drive the long-term decision-making," said Jaxon Ravens, chair of the Washington Democratic Party.

Raymond Buckley, chairman of the New Hampshire Democratic Party and vice chair of the DNC, said recent headlines are small potatoes compared to the controversies Clinton has ridden out in the past. "They've thrown everything and the kitchen sink at her in the last 20 years, and she has survived and thrived," he said.

Several attendees said any controversy about funding for the Clinton Foundation would be outweighed by the worked it conducted around the world. "It's beloved," Jaime Harrison, chair of the South Carolina Democratic Party, said of the foundation.

But if Democrats are in agreement that Clinton hasn't been dinged by the recent news stories, there isn't consensus about how much the likely nominee should be tested by her own party between now and next July's convention in Philadelphia.

Many attendees painted the relative quiet on the Democratic side as a good thing, saying the crowded Republican field would draw the eventual GOP nominee far to the right and create an embarrassing sideshow. DNC Chairwoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz told assembled Democrats that she planned to watch the Republican debates while chowing down on popcorn. New Hampshire's Buckley said he'd been enjoying enjoying the "epic clown car" of the GOP primary. Others spoke of a GOP "three-ring circus."

But some in the party want other Democrats to throw their hats in the ring — believing a competitive primary will better prepare Clinton for the general election.

"I want an all-out battle all the way to June," said Bob Mullholland, a Democratic committeeman from California with a "Ready for Hillary" pin on his lapel.

Mullholland said that though he has already committed to Clinton, a competitive primary would energize the base, pull new voters into the Democratic fold, and give the party a chance to hone its message ahead of the general election. (California's primary is currently set for June 7, 2016.)

"I wish we would have some other candidates running," said Cordelia Burks, vice chair of the Indiana Democratic Party, who said she plans to support Clinton when she runs. "I think it would give the nation the opportunity to have a debate."

Pennsylvania Democratic Party chairman Jim Burns, on the other hand, was less concerned about the opportunity for a debate. Though Burn conceded that “a competitive primary is a good thing,” he added that Clinton “does not need a primary.”

“If Hillary chooses to do this, there would be little to no pushback,” he said. “She’s so far ahead of any possible challenger.”

Stanley Grossman, a Democrats Abroad leader who lives in London, also dismissed the benefits of competition.

“I think what we need is absolute unity,” he said.

Wall Street Journal: “Hillary Clinton’s Complex Corporate Ties”

By James V. Grimaldi and Rebecca Ballhaus

February 19, 2015, 10:30 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Family charities collected donations from companies she promoted as secretary of state

Among recent secretaries of state, Hillary Clinton was one of the most aggressive global cheerleaders for American companies, pushing governments to sign deals and change policies to the advantage of corporate giants such as General Electric Co. , Exxon Mobil Corp. , Microsoft Corp. and Boeing Co.

At the same time, those companies were among the many that gave to the Clinton family’s global foundation set up by her husband, former President Bill Clinton. At least 60 companies that lobbied the State Department during her tenure donated a total of more than $26 million to the Clinton Foundation, according to a Wall Street Journal analysis of public and foundation disclosures.

As Mrs. Clinton prepares to embark on a race for the presidency, she has a web of connections to big corporations unique in American politics—ties forged both as secretary of state and by her family’s charitable interests. Those relationships are emerging as an issue for Mrs. Clinton’s expected presidential campaign as income disparity and other populist themes gain early attention.

Indeed, Clinton Foundation money-raising already is drawing attention. “To a lot of progressive Democrats, Clinton’s ties to corporate America are disturbing,” says Jack Pitney, a politics professor at Claremont McKenna College who once worked for congressional Republicans. Mrs. Clinton’s connections to companies, he says, “are a bonanza for opposition researchers because they enable her critics to suggest the appearance of a conflict of interest.”

The Wall Street Journal identified the companies involved with both Clinton-family charitable endeavors and with Mrs. Clinton’s State Department by examining large corporate donations to the Clinton Foundation, then reviewing lobbying-disclosure reports filed by those companies. At least 44 of those 60 companies also participated in philanthropic projects valued at $3.2 billion that were set up though a wing of the foundation called the Clinton Global Initiative, which coordinates the projects but receives no cash for them.

Mrs. Clinton’s connections to the companies don’t end there. As secretary of state, she created 15 public-private partnerships coordinated by the State Department, and at least 25 companies contributed to those partnerships. She also sought corporate donations for another charity she co-founded, a nonprofit women’s group called Vital Voices.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton's spokesman, Nick Merrill, says: "She did the job that every secretary of state is supposed to do and what the American people expect of them—especially during difficult economic times. She proudly and loudly advocated on behalf of American business and took every opportunity she could to promote U.S. commercial interests abroad."

Corporate donations to politically connected charities aren't illegal so long as they aren't in exchange for favors. There is no evidence of that with the Clinton Foundation.

In some cases, donations came after Mrs. Clinton took action that helped a company. In other cases, the donation came first. In some instances, donations came both before and after. All of the companies mentioned in this article said their charitable donations had nothing to do with their lobbying agendas with Mrs. Clinton's State Department.

President Barack Obama 's transition team worried enough about potential problems stemming from Clinton-organization fundraising while Mrs. Clinton was secretary of state that it asked Mr. Clinton to quit raising money from foreign governments for the Clinton Global Initiative and to seek approval for paid speaking engagements, which he did. The transition team didn't put limits on corporate fundraising.

The foundation resumed soliciting foreign governments after Mrs. Clinton left the State Department. The official name of the foundation was changed to the Bill, Hillary & Chelsea Clinton Foundation. Mrs. Clinton became a director. All told, the Clinton Foundation and its affiliates have collected donations and pledges from all sources of more than $1.6 billion, according to their tax returns. On Thursday, the foundation said that if Mrs. Clinton runs for president, it would consider whether to continue accepting foreign-government contributions as part of an internal policy review.

"The Clinton Foundation has raised hundreds of millions that it claims is for charitable causes, but clearly overlaps with Hillary Clinton's political ambitions," said Tim Miller, director of America Rising PAC, a conservative group that has targeted Mrs. Clinton.

Foundation spokesman Craig Minassian says the group's work helps millions around the world and its donors have a history of supporting such work. "So when companies get involved with the Clinton Foundation it's for only one reason, because they know our work matters," he says.

In her book, "Hard Choices," Mrs. Clinton said one of her goals at the State Department was "placing economics at the heart of our foreign policy." She wrote: "It was clearer than ever that America's economic strength and our global leadership were a package deal."

Matthew Goodman, a former Clinton State Department official who is now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, a Washington think tank, says Mrs. Clinton is the first secretary of state to make economics such a focus since George C. Marshall, who helped rebuild postwar Europe.

Economic Statecraft

That approach, which Mrs. Clinton called "economic statecraft," emerged in discussions with Robert Hormats, a former Goldman Sachs Group Inc. investment banker who has worked in Democratic and Republican administrations and became an undersecretary of state. "One of the very first items was, how do we strengthen the role of the State Department in economic policy?" he says.

The focus positioned Mrs. Clinton to pursue not just foreign-policy results, but domestic economic ones.

Early in Mrs. Clinton's tenure, according to Mr. Hormats, Microsoft's then Chief Research Officer Craig Mundie asked the State Department to send a ranking official to a fourth annual meeting of U.S. software executives and Chinese government officials about piracy and Internet freedom. Mr. Hormats joined the December 2009 meeting in Beijing.

Since 2005, Microsoft has given the Clinton Global Initiative $1.3 million, in addition to free software, according to the foundation.

In 2011, Microsoft launched a three-year initiative coordinated by the Clinton Global Initiative to provide free or discounted software and other resources to students and teachers—a commitment Microsoft estimated to be worth $130 million.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Hormats says there was no relation between Microsoft's donations and the State Department's participation in the China conference.

In 2012, the Clinton Foundation approached GE about working together to expand a health-access initiative the company had launched four years earlier, says a GE spokeswoman.

That same year, Mrs. Clinton lobbied for GE to be selected by the Algerian government to build power plants in that country. She went to Algiers that October and met with President Abdelaziz Bouteflika. "I saw an opportunity for advancing prosperity in Algeria and seizing an opportunity for American business," she explained in her book.

A month after Mrs. Clinton's trip, the Clinton Foundation announced the health-initiative partnership with GE, the company's first involvement with the foundation. GE eventually contributed between $500,000 and $1 million to the partnership.

The following September, GEwon the contracts with the Algerian government, saying they marked "some of its largest power agreements in company history."

Mrs. Clinton championed U.S. energy companies and launched an office to promote overseas projects. Many of those efforts were focused in Eastern and Central Europe, where she saw energy development as a hedge against Russia's dominance in oil and gas. Companies that had interests in those areas included Exxon Mobil and Chevron Corp.

One effort, the Global Shale Gas Initiative, promoted hydraulic fracturing, or fracking, a technique perfected by U.S. companies. In 2010, Mrs. Clinton flew to Krakow to announce a Polish-American cooperation on a global shale-gas initiative, according to her book. At the time, the U.S. Energy Information Administration predicted abundant deposits of shale gas in Poland.

After pursuing shale-gas projects in Poland, Exxon Mobil gave up a few years later, and Chevron said late last month it would abandon its Poland project.

In 2012, Mrs. Clinton flew to Sofia, Bulgaria, and urged the Bulgarian Parliament to reconsider its moratorium on fracking and its withdrawal of Chevron's five-year exploration license. A few months later, the government allowed conventional gas exploration, but not fracking. Chevron left Bulgaria in 2012.

Ben Schreiber of the environmental group Friends of the Earth says: "We've long been concerned about the ties that Hillary Clinton has to the oil-and-gas industry."

Both Exxon and Chevron are supporters of the Clinton Foundation. Chevron donated $250,000 in 2013. A Chevron spokesman said the Clinton charity "is one of many programs and partnerships that the company has had or maintains across a number of issue areas and topics pertinent to our business."

Exxon Mobil has given about $2 million to the Clinton Global Initiative, starting in 2009. Since 2007, Exxon Mobil also has given $16.8 million to Vital Voices, the nonprofit women's group co-founded by Mrs. Clinton, according to the group's spokeswoman.

An Exxon Mobil spokesman said the donations were made to support work on issues Exxon Mobil has long championed, such as programs to fight malaria and empower women. "That is the sole motivation for our support of charitable programs associated with the Clintons," he said. "We did not seek or receive any special consideration on the Shale Gas Initiative."

In October 2009, Mrs. Clinton went to bat for aerospace giant Boeing, which was seeking to sell jets to Russia, by flying to Moscow to visit the Boeing Design Center. "I made the case that Boeing's jets set the global gold standard, and, after I left, our embassy kept at it," she wrote in her book.

About seven months later, in June 2010, Russia agreed to purchase 50 Boeing 737s for $3.7 billion, choosing Boeing over Europe's Airbus Group

NV.

Two months later, Boeing made its first donation to the Clinton Foundation—$900,000 to help rebuild Haiti's public-education system. Overall, Boeing has contributed around $1.1 million to the Clinton Foundation since 2010.

A Boeing spokeswoman said it is routine for U.S. officials to advocate on behalf of businesses such as Boeing. "U.S. businesses face fierce global competition, and oftentimes an unlevel playing field in the global marketplace," she said in a written statement. "Secretary Clinton did nothing for Boeing that former U.S. presidents and cabinet secretaries haven't done for decades, or that their foreign counterparts haven't done on behalf of companies like Airbus."

Before every overseas trip, says Mr. Hormats, the former undersecretary of state, he helped prepare a list of U.S. corporate interests for Mrs. Clinton to advocate while abroad.

During Mrs. Clinton's three trips to India, she urged the government to kill a ban on stores that sell multiple brands, a law aimed at department stores or big-box retailers such as Wal-Mart Stores Inc.

"It wasn't just Wal-Mart," Mr. Hormats says. "It was the whole point of multibrand retail. Wal-Mart was, of course, the biggest."

Mrs. Clinton served on the board of the Bentonville, Ark.-based retailer between 1986 and 1992, when her husband was governor of that state, and the law firm she worked for at the time represented the company. Wal-Mart has donated nearly $1.2 million to the Clinton Foundation for a program that issues grants to student-run charitable projects. The company also has paid more than $370,000 in membership fees to the foundation since 2008, according to a Wal-Mart spokesman.

Trip to India

Before Mrs. Clinton's official trip to India in 2012, Wal-Mart Chief Executive Mike Duke joined her at the Summit of the Americas in Cartagena, Colombia, to pledge $12 million to help women in Latin America. The donation included $1.5 million in grants to 55,000 women entrepreneurs through the International Fund for Women and Girls, one of the 15 public-private partnerships Mrs. Clinton created at the State Department, and $500,000 for Vital Voices, the charity she co-founded.

"We committed to helping women around the world live better," Mr. Duke said at the time. "By working with leaders like Secretary Clinton, we're bringing that mission to life."

One month later, Mrs. Clinton traveled to India to make the case against the ban on retail stores such as Wal-Mart. Then-Prime Minister Manmohan Singh had proposed allowing companies such as Wal-Mart to invest up to 51% directly in local multibrand retailers, but one of his allies, Mamata Banerjee, a regional governor, opposed the idea. Ms. Banerjee's support was key to Mr. Singh's majority in Parliament.

Mrs. Clinton met with Ms. Banerjee to press the matter. She also said in a speech in West Bengal that U.S. retailers could bring an "enormous amount of expertise" to India in areas ranging from supply-chain management to working with small producers and farmers. Her lobbying was unsuccessful.

A Wal-Mart spokesman said the retailer had lobbied the State Department on the issue, which he said was one of dozens of topics important to the business.

After Mrs. Clinton's India trip, her husband asked Mr. Duke, Walmart's CEO, to change his schedule to appear at the opening panel of the Clinton Global Initiative. Mr. Duke agreed.

[Subtitle:] Hillary Clinton Should Ban Foreign Donors to the Clinton Global Initiative

The Clinton Foundation has become one of the world's major generators of charity, mobilizing global efforts to confront issues like health, climate change, economic development and equality for women and girls.

Since its inception in 2001, it has raised nearly $2 billion in cash and pledges with millions more flowing in from an impressive array of donors, including foreign governments, financial chieftains and domestic donors, many of the latter political heavyweights.

All of which underlines the need for Hillary Rodham Clinton, in her all but certified role as a Democratic presidential candidate, to reinstate the foundation's ban against foreign contributors, who might have matters of concern to bring before a future Clinton administration. This was a restriction Mrs. Clinton worked out with the Obama administration to allay concerns of potential conflict of interest when she became secretary of state in 2009.

According to a report this week in The Wall Street Journal, the ban was dropped after Mrs. Clinton left the administration in 2013, leading to a resumption of donations from foreign governments and agencies to the foundation's Clinton Global Initiative, which sponsors conferences of world leaders from government, industry and philanthropy. Donors have included the United Arab Emirates, Germany, Saudi Arabia, Australia, Oman and a Canadian government agency reported to be involved in promoting the Keystone XL pipeline.

Foreign nationals are banned by law from contributing to American politicians' campaign coffers. This ban does not apply to private foundations, but the idea behind it — that influence should not be bought — is relevant to a political campaign, where appearances can count for much.

The foundation, which has drawn bipartisan praise in the past, emphasizes that it is solely a philanthropy, not a political machine, declaring, "The bottom line: These contributions are helping improve the lives of millions of people across the world, for which we are grateful."

No critic has alleged a specific conflict of interest. The foundation, in fact, went beyond normal philanthropic bounds for transparency six years ago in instituting voluntary disclosure of donors within broad dollar ranges on its website. But this very information can feed criticism.

Donations from foreign governments and nationals, for example, were found to make up more than half of the category of $5-million-plus contributions, according to The Washington Post. A third of donations in the $1-million-plus bracket came from foreign governments and other overseas entities.

Substantial overlap was found between foundation contributors and familiar Clinton campaign donors and money bundlers. Considering the Clintons' popularity and influence in their party, this is no surprise. But it does make it important that Mrs. Clinton, in defending the family's efforts on behalf of the world's needy, reassure the public that the foundation will not become a vehicle for insiders' favoritism, should she run for and win the White House.

Restoring the restrictions on foreign donors would be a good way to make this point as Mrs. Clinton's widely expected campaign moves forward.

Wall Street Journal opinion: Kimberly Strassel, member of the WSJ editorial board: "The Clinton Foundation Super PAC"

By Kimberly A. Strassel

[Subtitle:] It's past time to drop the fiction that the Clinton Foundation is a charity.

Republican presidential aspirants are already launching political-action committees, gearing up for the expensive elections to come. They'll be hard-pressed to compete with the campaign vehicle Hillary Clinton has been erecting these past 14 years. You know, the Clinton Foundation.

With the news this week that Mrs. Clinton—the would-be occupant of the White House—is landing tens of millions from foreign governments for her shop, it's long past time to drop the fiction that the Clinton Foundation has ever been a charity. It's a political shop. Bill and Hillary have simply done with the foundation what they did with cattle futures and Whitewater and the Lincoln Bedroom and Johnny Chung—they've exploited the system.

Most family charities exist to allow self-made Americans to disperse their good fortune to philanthropic causes. The Clinton Foundation exists to allow the nation's most powerful couple to use their not-so-subtle persuasion to exact global tribute for a fund that promotes the Clintons.

Oh sure, the foundation doles out grants for this and that cause. But they don't rank next to the annual Bill Clinton show—the Clinton Global Initiative event—to which he summons heads of state and basks for a media week as post-presidential statesman. This is an organization that in 2013 spent $8.5 million in travel expenses alone, ferrying the Clintons to headliner events. Those keep Mrs. Clinton in the news, which helps when you want to be president.

It's a body that exists to keep the Clinton political team intact in between elections, working for the Clintons' political benefit. Only last week it came out that Dennis Cheng, who raised money for Mrs. Clinton's 2008 bid, and then transitioned to the Clinton Foundation's chief development officer, is now transitioning back to head up Mrs. Clinton's 2016 fundraising operation. Mr. Cheng has scored $248 million for the foundation, and his Rolodex comes with him. The Washington Post reported this week that already half the major donors backing Ready for Hillary, a group supporting her 2016 bid, are also foundation givers.

How much of these employees' salaries, how much of Mrs. Clinton's travel, was funded by the Saudis? Or the United Arab Emirates, or Oman, or any of the other foreign nations that The Wall Street Journal Tuesday reported have given millions to the foundation this past year? How many voters has Mrs. Clinton wooed, how many potential donors has she primed, how many influential people has she recruited for her campaign via the Clinton Foundation?

The foundation claims none, but that's the other Clinton stroke of brilliance in using a charity as a campaign vehicle—we can't know. Poor Jeb Bush has to abide by all those pesky campaign-finance laws that require him to disclose exact donor names, and dates and amounts. And that also bar contributions from foreign entities.

Not a problem for Team Clinton. The foundation does divulge contributors—after a fashion—but doesn't give exact amounts or dates. Did Mrs. Clinton ever take any oddly timed actions as secretary of state? Who knows? Not the Federal Election Commission.

The foundation likes to note that it adopted self-imposed limits on foreign contributions during the period when Mrs. Clinton was at the State Department. Which is nice. Then again, that ban wasn't absolute, and it isn't clear it encompassed nonprofits funded by foreign governments, or covered wealthy foreigners, or foreign corporations. Nothing is clear. This is the Clintons. That's how they like it.

This is the baseline scandal of the Clinton Foundation—it's a political group that gets to operate outside the rules imposed on every other political player. Then comes the ethical morass. Republican National Committee spokesman Michael Short summed it up perfectly in a Wednesday WSJ story: "When that 3 a.m. phone call comes, do voters really want to have a president on the line who took truckloads of cash from other countries? "

The nation's ethics guardians have gently declared the Clintons might clear this up with more disclosure, or by again limiting the foundation's acceptance of foreign money. What about the amounts already banked? The damage is done. If this were Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, a likely GOP candidate, he'd be declared disqualified for office. The benefit of being a Clinton is that the nation expects this, and the bar for disqualification now sits in the exosphere.

Democrats might nonetheless consider how big a liability this is for their potential nominee. It's hard to label your GOP opponent anti-woman when the Clinton Foundation is funded by countries that bar women from voting and driving like Saudi Arabia. It's hard to call your GOP opponent a heartless capitalist—out of tune with middle-class anxieties—when you owe your foundation's soul to Canadian mining magnates and Ethiopian construction billionaires. And it's hard to claim you will fix a burning world when you owe foundation gratitude to countries holding the fossil-fuel blowtorches.

Mrs. Clinton won't let that stop her. So Democrats have to decide if they want to once again put their ethics in the blind Clinton trust.

Hillary Clinton will sit down with CNN's Fareed Zakaria for an interview set to air this Sunday, sources familiar with the interview told POLITICO.

The former Secretary of State is set to tape an hour-long interview with Zakaria on Friday morning. It will air this Sunday on "Fareed Zakaria GPS" at 10 a.m. ET.

The interview will almost certainly focus on international events, including the Malaysia Airlines crash in Ukraine, U.S relations with Russia, and the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in Gaza. It is the latest in a string of interviews Clinton has conducted since early June.

We've reached out to spokespeople for both Clinton and CNN for more details about the interview, and will update here if and when we hear back.

The American Prospect: "Hillary for Liberals: A Conversation With Walter Shapiro"

By Harold Meyerson

July 23, 2014

[Subtitle:] "As a campaigner, Hillary can do a shot and a beer better than Barack Obama can," Shapiro says. So there's that.

As a reporter and columnist for Time, Newsweek, the Washington Post, USA Today, Esquire, Salon, and other publications, Walter Shapiro has covered nine presidential elections and the nation's politics for four decades. He is currently a fellow at the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University and a lecturer in political science at Yale while he finishes a book about his great-uncle, a vaudevillian and con man who once swindled Hitler.

Shapiro is also an accomplished Hillary-ologist, having first interviewed Hillary Clinton in the Arkansas governor's mansion for Time in September 1992. In early May, Shapiro sat down with Prospect editor-at-large Harold Meyerson to talk about a question he's internally debated for years: On balance, would a Hillary Clinton candidacy and presidency be a good or bad thing for the liberal cause?

The following discussion has been edited for concision and clarity.

Harold Meyerson: Walter, when liberals look at Hillary Clinton, what should they see? The Democratic Party and the country have certainly changed since she was first lady, and even since she was a senator and secretary of state.

Walter Shapiro: I've always thought that Bill Clinton was never really a person of the '60s. Bill Clinton started in 1960 as a 14-year-old who wanted to be governor of Arkansas. He came out of the '60s as a 24-year-old who wanted to be governor of Arkansas without going to Vietnam. But Hillary did the full, life-changing conversion from the obedient Goldwater Girl to delivering an ethereal but genuinely anti-war address at Wellesley in '69. So in a sense, as far as the culture of the time washing over someone, it washed over her more than it ever washed over Bill.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HM: Still, she spent so many years in Arkansas, and Arkansas's political culture is not one with which most liberals are comfortable. Both Clintons were clearly supportive of the civil-rights revolution. But the other part of that culture is the Stephens investment firm and Wal-Mart, and to get somewhere in Arkansas politics, you eventually have relations with them. Hillary famously was on the Wal-Mart board for a while.

WS: What stayed with me, and I still think it's really important for understanding Hillary, happened in March of 1992, at a debate before the Illinois primary. Jerry Brown (Bill Clinton's primary opponent) went after Bill Clinton in part for the legal work that Hillary did at Rose Law Firm on behalf of banks. And Hillary at some point said, in effect, "Of course I work for banks; who do you expect me to work for if I'm a lawyer?" Well, there were, believe it or not, other clients in the state of Arkansas in the 1980s while her husband was governor.

HM: That's no small part of what gives liberals pause about Hillary—who is, of course, still going around giving talks to the Goldman Sachses of the world. Is she too inextricably linked to that world? One of the major issues liberals had with Obama is that his economic team has been, like Bill Clinton's, primarily Robert Rubin protégés. That's two straight Democratic presidencies with a Wall Street pedigree.

WS: As a campaigner, Hillary can do a shot and a beer better than Barack Obama can. She was an exceedingly good candidate when it was too late in the '08 primaries with white working-class voters in Pennsylvania, in Indiana, in states like that. That said, everything in the ledger says she's not a policy populist.

Remember that the Bill Clinton administration at its most successful was the Democratic answer to Reaganism. It was what the French call "the spirit of the staircase"—coming up with everything you should have said at the party just after you've left it. The administration said, let's get off the table everything Reagan criticized about the Democrats. It was welfare, so they ended it; it was crime, so they came up with funding for 100,000 more cops; it was economic deficits, so they came up with a balanced budget.

To some extent, electing Hillary Clinton in 2016 could continue a debate with Ronald Reagan that no one else in American life is still having. The Democrats have mostly forgotten Reagan, and the Republicans have turned him into this sainted soul of political constancy. But a Hillary presidency would be still framed by the Democratic memory of those horrible years in the wilderness in the 1980s, when the Democrats got wiped out in three successive elections.

HM: But the political landscape, the demographic profile of voters has changed so much since then. More political space has opened up on the left; the nation has plainly moved in a liberal direction on social issues; there are very few Blue Dogs remaining. Is this defensive crouch against the Republicans a politically viable stance?

WS: I'm talking about what makes her tick. Of course, she won two elections in a very diverse state since Bill's presidency, and she won an awful lot of presidential primaries in '08. She understands the diversity of America in 2017—except in the economic sense.

That said, I don't think she's the candidate of Archie Bunker's America. But the worst thing that could have happened to her in terms of framing any economic populist message was to run for the Senate from New York rather than, say, Arkansas. Not only do the Clintons have a certain psychological need for money—that would probably be a separate course in the Department of Hillary Studies—but her constituents were Wall Street, and they were also the people who were funding all the Clinton initiatives and giving speaking fees to Bill.

Ultimately she has an orthodox, mainstream, centrist, Eisenhower Republican view of the economy. It is much to the left of today's Republican Party since there are no Eisenhower Republicans left, but it is also much less in keeping with large segments of the Democratic Party. I can see her being very involved in raising the minimum wage, because it's not as if hedge-fund billionaires are on the barricades against it. But trying to do a better, tougher version of Dodd-Frank? Let's merely say that the polls would have to get very dismal for Hillary leading up to the 2020 election for that to even be on her agenda.

HM: Let's go to foreign policy.

WS: If you wanted me to state my own personal reservations about Hillary, I would have started with foreign policy.

HM: What would those reservations be?

WS: First of all, other than the anti-war feeling, which is more generational than an elaborate, nuanced foreign-policy view, I don't think she had terribly developed foreign-policy views during Bill's presidency. OK, there was the general, and to my mind, admirable tilt toward humanitarian intervention in both Haiti and, much more important, in Bosnia. I do not think she would have dithered the way Obama has on Syria.

That said, I've seen no evidence that she had too much anguish over her vote to authorize Bush to go to war in Iraq. John Kerry turned himself into elaborate pretzel positions to try to justify that vote. Hillary may have anguished about many things, but that does not seem to be in the Top 10 Hillary Anguish moments.

HM: What do you think her hawkishness on Iraq would portend for foreign policy if Hillary were president?

WS: While she is not a Dick Cheney groupie, in a situation where there is a range of military actions on the table and there's a responsible, mainstream opinion within the administration toward using the military—and the foreign-policy community says military action is called for—she would probably go with it and cheerlead it on. I don't think she's going to invent a war with Mongolia out of some crazed geopolitical effort to encircle China. But hers would probably be a more hawkish administration than we have now with Obama and John Kerry.

I'm much less worried about her starting a war with Denmark, though, than I am by the fact that she is probably the Democratic presidential candidate who would do the least to rein in the National Security Agency and all the leftover aspects of the "war on terror." Sadly, both Hillary and Bill know that civil liberties is that which closes on Saturday night.

HM: Bill Clinton was not famed for his managerial prowess and neither is Barack Obama. That's certainly part of the president's job. Is Hillary a better manager than Bill?

WS: I think she is much more than just that. If you have been through a disaster like the first two years of the Clinton administration, you know what to do now. Flash forward to a White House in 2017. First, Bill and Hillary will have worked out their marriage, with her 69 and him 70, as well as any couple is likely to. If ever there's a marriage that by 2017 has few surprises, it's probably that one. Second, Hillary has been through two disastrous, disorganized White Houses under Bill Clinton and Obama. The way Obamacare was handled, in that the entire story of health care got lost, also the failure to put enough emphasis on the economy after the stimulus passed—all these things Hillary saw. She would come into the White House with a greater understanding of White House dysfunction than anyone in Democratic Party history. To have been in the Obama cabinet would also steel you against creating a White House where people believe they've invented the wheel, that they're geniuses—the problems that have afflicted this White House.

HM: Bill is clearly going to be her chief adviser. How does this factor into everything?

WS: It will cause certain lines-of-authority confusion in the White House. But ultimately, I think it's more good than bad. Every president, from what I've read and seen, communes with the ghosts of presidents past. It's sort of nice to have a ghost of presidents past available on call. There will come a point if Hillary is president in, say, 2019, that something happens that already happened somewhere, sometime during Bill Clinton's eight years in the White House. It would be really good to have the lessons from that analogue on tap.

HM: Right now, there's no one else in the Democratic Party who's within 40 or 50 points of Hillary in presidential polling. How do you assess her strengths and weaknesses as a candidate? A lot of what you're describing is not necessarily the stuff that resonates with younger voters, except possibly that her election would be historic.

WS: There is an iron law of campaign journalism: Never assume anything with absolute certainty in presidential politics, because there are always surprises. President Muskie would be the first to remind us. That said, I had drinks last night with two prominent Republican consultants. What they told me is that they believe that Hillary—running as a centrist, not a populist, and moderately hawkish—would just sweep the field. There is no Republican who could possibly beat her except in exceptional circumstances. Part of it is the history-making nature of the race. But it is also this: All the things that make liberals a little uneasy about a Hillary presidency are the things that are perfect for a general election against a fill-in-the-blank Republican. Of course, in the remote chance that Rand Paul got the nomination, it would be interesting to see a Republican running against a Democrat with the Republican running to the left on national security.

But the larger point—and it's one of the reasons, after going back and forth within myself, I am more in favor of her running than not—is that American politics since the 2000 election has been balanced on a knife's edge. While there are moments when one party surges ahead, pretty much the country has been in equal balance. Beyond 2000, had just 130,000 votes been different in Ohio in 2004, John Kerry would have been president even though he would have lost the popular vote. Mitt Romney, not exactly someone who is going down in the Candidate Hall of Fame, still got, what, 47 percent of the vote?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HM: That was the appropriate percentage for him.

WS: The point is that Hillary could win a resounding victory that could bring in a Democratic majority to govern. And I would much rather have a president with a majority to govern, even if the decisions she made were not always decisions I agreed with, than another eight years, or four years, of a Democrat hamstrung by a divided Congress.

HM: Why don't we hear more of an outcry from the left of the party for an alternative to Hillary?

WS: Three reasons come to mind. For some, it's that electing a woman president would be historic. For others, there is the depressed sense of dashed expectations after five years of Obama. But the biggest reason, I suspect, is the political truism: "You can't beat somebody with nobody." And despite Elizabeth Warren fantasies, the Democratic left doesn't have anyone who looks like a plausible president now willing to run.

That doesn't mean that Hillary will run unopposed. Maybe it will be former Governor Brian Schweitzer of Montana. Maybe it'll be Howard Dean—or Senator Bernie Sanders, to keep coming up with Vermonters. I went back and checked since World War II. Aside from incumbent presidents, no one has ever been handed a presidential nomination unopposed other than Richard Nixon in 1960. And even Nixon had to kiss the hem of Nelson Rockefeller's garment with something called the Compact of Fifth Avenue.

HM: Can Hillary turn out young people like Obama did—a key to both his victories? Can she engender a remotely comparable excitement factor?

WS: No. But probably neither can any other Democrat. Obama leached the sense of political excitement out of an entire generation with the gap between his campaign style and his governing style.

Also, remember that young voters in 2016 will have different life experiences than young voters in 2008. A 21-year-old in 2016 will have been in first grade on 9/11 and was too young at the time to understand the lies that sent us to war with Iraq. That means that these 2016 voters—no matter the candidates—will react to different stimuli than young voters in 2008.

So how can Hillary win in 2016? Maybe by sparking greater enthusiasm from women—especially single women. Maybe a 54-year-old waitress in Waterloo, Iowa, will vote for the first time. Hillary might also change the political map by running competitively in states like Kentucky, West Virginia, Indiana, and Arkansas.

HM: How would a primary challenge from someone like Warren affect Hillary's campaign? In terms of constituencies, I can see the party establishment—unions, electeds, blacks, traditional donors—sticking with her. But could that "Mondale-ize" her? And could Warren muster the kind of support that Gary Hart did in his 1984 challenge to Mondale?

WS: My heart goes pitter-patter whenever I get a Walter Mondale question. Which, oddly enough, happens less and less these days. But Mondale-Hart in '84 is one of those races that explains the Democratic Party, along with Carter-Kennedy in 1980 and Bobby Kennedy versus Gene McCarthy in 1968.

I'd be stunned beyond belief if Elizabeth Warren ran against Hillary. Of course, I never expected Spiro Agnew, Dan Quayle, and Julia Louis-Dreyfus to be vice presidents of the United States. The Hart challenge to Mondale, which was based on amorphous "new ideas," was in hindsight a generational battle. Elizabeth Warren is only two years younger than Hillary.

There has to be an issue with a passionate following to sustain a major primary challenge to Hillary. Right now, the Democrats don't have one. For a project at Brookings, I've been watching what's being stressed in Democratic House primaries around the country. At this point, NSA spying and drone attacks are just not voting issues for liberals. Getting tough with Wall Street—like single-payer health insurance—was something much more likely to trigger an adrenaline rush for the left in 2009 than in 2016.

HM: But Walter, a lot of recent polling done for Democrats shows that there is a sizable constituency that believes the economy is rigged; that the rich get away with low taxes while the middle class can't; that free trade with other nations has damaged our economy; that when a candidate says he or she sides against Wall Street and with workers, they have more of a claim on this constituency's support. Don't you think there's real political space for a candidate who positions herself or himself to Hillary's left on these issues?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WS: Polls, schmolls. Which should be a Yiddish word meaning “enough with the cross-tabs.”

I agree that there’s space on the left. But that’s a lot different than having a charismatic candidate capable of exploiting it. What’s needed to run against Hillary is more than just the ability to play to the choir by mouthing off on MSNBC. That’s the campaign of Dennis Kucinich redux.

The more that we talk about this, the more I wish that Paul Wellstone were still alive. I don’t see anyone of his liberal stature—anyone with his sense of fun—willing to take on Hillary. It would take an exceptional candidate to harvest that underlying unease with a Clinton restoration. But it’s 18 months until Iowa and, boy, have I been wrong before.

For Hillary, a challenge from the left—as long as it didn’t catch fire—would actually help set her up for the general election since it would send the message that she was more of a centrist than a Karl Rove caricature. I also suspect it would be easier for Hillary to co-opt a primary challenge by making the right dovish noises on foreign policy or NSA eavesdropping than by attacking Wall Street, which would be for her an Olympic-level gymnastic trick. But, then, we’ve already seen Bill Clinton’s Dick Morris–inspired triangulation for the 1996 campaign. So maybe I shouldn’t dismiss Hillary’s malleability on economic issues if that was what was needed to win the nomination. But I wouldn’t count on follow-through if she got to the White House.

Washington Post blog: The Switch: “Democrats’ latest tech mines your relationship data”

By Brian Fung

July 25, 2014, 11:24 a.m. EDT

While the electorate keeps playing the Hillary Clinton waiting game, Ready for Hillary is moving ahead with a plan to achieve the next big breakthrough in campaign technology.

The super PAC that's laying the groundwork for a potential Clinton run in 2016 is testing software to determine whether data about social ties can help identify likely grassroots leaders and new supporters. While the technique was pioneered in the closing weeks of the 2012 election by Obama campaign strategists, the latest effort promises to be far more systematic. If the insights into online relationships prove useful in this year's midterm elections, further experiments could even lead to campaigns picking out the most active organizers before those people even know it.

"Coming out of Obama for America in 2012, we started to really see some things that I refer to as 'social pressure' — seeing what your friends are doing and having that influence you to have a certain behavior," said Nickie Titus, Ready for Hillary's director of digital. "We're really trying to capitalize on those lessons."

Obama's tinkering with social data began with Facebook. Obama strategists encouraged users of the social network to connect their accounts with Obama for America's Web site. Eventually, OFA figured out using an algorithm how to target political content to each individual user in ways that would get them to act. OFA officials claimed that by the end of the campaign, the targeted content was more effective at driving clicks than a comparable banner ad.

The new approach expands on that concept. What if you could find out that a Clinton supporter named Joe was able to convince his friend Sara to become a volunteer? And what if you also knew that Joe was more effective at engaging Sara than his other friend, Pete? You'd know to concentrate your efforts on a) training Sara to become the next Joe and b) to encourage Joe to keep up the good work.

Spread out across millions of voters, this knowledge could become a force multiplier for campaign strategists. From looking at interactions between individuals, they could determine the most engaged supporters and reach out to them, tapping them to train or recruit other volunteers. This "snowflake" approach to grassroots campaigning was what gave OFA much of its reach in the physical world in 2012. Now that strategy is being replicated on the Internet.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The tool for this is called Recruiter. Developed by the Democratic firm NGP VAN, Recruiter isn't connected or reliant on Facebook for data at all. In the coming weeks, it'll get its first shakedown by Ready for Hillary and other political groups. Over time, Recruiter could be combined with predictive computer modeling — another emerging political technology that's helping strategists target likely supporters based on their demographic characteristics or civic history.

Data about high-impact volunteers, said NGP VAN chief executive Stu Trevelyan, could someday be combined with predictive models to identify potential new leaders.

"It's not just 'Sally is 5 for 10 in voter contact,'" said Trevelyan, "but it's that 'People who look like Sally could be 5 for 10' and that 'People that look like Sally should be asking people that look like Jim for money' and you can predict things that way."

While campaigns have largely reached the limits of improving the voter file — those massive databases of names, e-mail addresses and commercial information that became so important in the 2012 cycle — the next step is to figure out how to identify and leverage the connections between entries in those files.

National Journal: "Obama Aide Tweaks GOP on Impeachment"

By James Oliphant

July 25, 2014

[Subtitle:] Dan Pfeiffer, a senior adviser to the president, says Boehner "opened to door" to impeachment proceedings by suing the president.

In a bit of election-year gamesmanship, a top aide to President Obama warned Friday to not rule out an attempt by House Republicans to impeach the president at some point during the remainder of his second term.

"I think a lot if people in this town laugh that off," said Dan Pfeiffer, a senior adviser to Obama, while speaking at a breakfast with reporters in Washington sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor. "I would not discount that possibility."

Noting rising calls for impeachment among some in the GOP, including former Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, Pfeiffer said House Speaker John Boehner "opened the door" to considering such a step after he moved to sue Obama over executive actions.

Part of the White House's messaging strategy has long been to paint House Republicans as extreme as possible, so in that vein, any loose talk of impeachment sits right in its wheelhouse. But Pfeiffer was quick to add that he did not think impeachment proceedings "would be good for the president" saying that it was "very serious thing."

He dismissed out of hand the notion Obama has abused his executive authority to a point where there would be grounds for such a move. At the same time, there was little doubt that he views the consternation that Obama's actions provoke as good for the president and Democrats overall. GOP criticism of the White House "is not going to cause us to trim our sails," he said.

The administration is studying ways to ease the child-migrant crisis at the border through executive action, as well as provide some relief to some undocumented immigrants facing deportation—something Pfeiffer expects to provoke an "aggressive" response from Republicans.

Pfeiffer also addressed the potential 2016 presidential field, downplaying any suggestion that Hillary Clinton was trying to separate himself from Obama's foreign policy. "She has been incredibly loyal to the president," he said. "I don't think she's trying to distance herself."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked about possible GOP candidates for president, Pfeiffer criticized Texas Sen. Ted Cruz as being "deeply out of step" with the country.

Pfeiffer was asked whether he would rather run against Cruz or Texas Gov. Rick Perry. Grinning, he responded by saying that was like "would you rather have ice cream or cake?"

He also said he finds the idea of a run by Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky "intriguing," saying that Paul is "the only Republican who has articulated a message that is potentially appealing to younger Americans."

Arkansas Times blog: Arkansas Blog: "A serious talk with Hillary Clinton"

By Max Brantley

July 25, 2014, 7:11 a.m.

The New York Times' John Harwood interviewed Hillary Clinton on NPR yesterday and condensed the interview into a 10-questions format for the Times' Caucus feature.

It's a substantive discussion about weighty world problems. Not hairdos or house inventory.

An Arkansas Delta politician once told me there's a word you always want to put on your campaign push cards (whether you deserve the label or not). That word?

"Qualified."

It comes to mind after reading this interview. Doesn't mean you have to agree with what she says or want her to be president. But she's done the homework.

The foreign policy commentary dominates, but there was this on Paul Ryan's supposed game-changing outlook on poverty programs:

Q.

A couple of things before we run out of time. Paul Ryan's out with a plan today proposing that states be allowed to take all of the programs for those in need in one revenue stream as a way of finding better ways to make them work. Is that a good idea?

A.

No, not in the current atmosphere. It is not a good idea. All one has to look at is that nearly half the states refuse to expand Medicaid to realize why it's a bad idea. If states won't even take what are very generous terms from the federal government to give working people and poor people access to health care, how can we turn over all of the resources that are meant to assist those in need?

The Hill blog: In The Know: "Pelosi joins Hillary in the pantsuit set"

By Judy Kurtz

July 25, 2014, 10:51 a.m. EDT

SPOTTED: House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, taking a page out of Hillary Clinton's style guide, as she donned a pantsuit to dine at downtown Washington hotspot Bibiana.

The California Democrat paired a scarf with her outfit and stayed at the Italian eatery for about two hours on Thursday night, according to our spy.

Clinton is of course known for her preference for variations on the ensemble. The former secretary of State describes herself on her Twitter profile as a "pantsuit aficionado."

Mediaite: "Ben Carson's Book Outsold Hillary's Hard Choices Last Week"

By Tina Nguyen

July 25, 2014, 8:04 a.m. EDT

Last week, according to the latest figures from the Nielsen BookScan, Ben Carson's memoir "One Nation" outsold Hillary Clinton's book Hard Choices by a whopping 60%.

Figures provided to The Daily Caller indicated that Carson's book, which was released a week before Hard Choices, sold roughly 16,000 copies to Clinton's 10,000. At this point, total sales of Carson's book trail Hillary's by only 9,000 copies — which is not that much, considering Hard Choices shipped a million books to stores in the first place.

Both authors are widely viewed to be possible presidential contenders in 2016, which will undoubtedly lead to pundit-class questions about Hillary. On MSNBC this morning, the panelists debated whether people were "fatigued" by Hillary, and whether this book battle could be seen as a proxy war between two potential presidential candidates.

"A book tour is like a presidential campaign," said Donny Deutsch. "You package the product and try to get people excited about it. [And] the book tour and the book's failure to sell as many copies as a publisher, suggests she needs a different repackaging. Still the front-runner for the White House, but you've got to be about the future and about being forward-looking and she is not right now."

A Platform for Disability Rights Change at the White House

As we review President Obama’s first term, ADAPT is deeply disappointed by his failure to keep his promises to the Disability Community and make substantive progress supporting the integration of people with disabilities in the community. As we look forward into his second term, ADAPT urges the Disability Community to hold him accountable for these failures but also to demand that he address the critical issues we are raising. Today, ADAPT demands that President Obama…

KEEP HIS PROMISES to the Disability Community by:

* Issuing a statement that he supports the development of legislation that would finally end Medicaid’s institutional bias and assure that people with disabilities have a community-based alternative to institutional placement; and

* Instructing the Office of Management and Budget to return the proposed rules implementing changes to the “companionship exemption” to the Department of Labor and require DOL to follow Executive Order 13563 and fully involve the Disability Community in the development of these rules, or alternatively – implement the compromise proposed by ADAPT and the National Council on Independent Living.

EFFECTIVELY ENGAGE the Disability Community by:

* Hiring staff from the Disability Community in the Office of Public Engagement who can create and coordinate direct dialogue between the Obama Administration and Americans with disabilities; and

* Hiring staff from the Disability Community for the White House Domestic Policy Council who can assure that the voice of the Disability

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Community is included in the domestic policy-making process in the White House.

LEAD THE COUNTRY in ending the injustice of institutionalization by:

* Designating Vice President Biden as an “Ambassador for Community Living” and sending him on an Olmstead Anniversary Tour where he visits ten model programs for transitioning people with disabilities into the community and convenes round-tables in ten states to support them in developing effective systems for truly integrating people with disabilities; and

* Issuing an Executive Order that acknowledges inhumane, outmoded and expensive warehousing of people in nursing facilities and other institutions and implements specific steps to end this practice.

Of course, much of the work to FREE OUR PEOPLE must be done by the Federal agencies.

HEALTH AND HUMAN SERVICES
The President should instruct HHS Secretary Sebelius to:

* Identify a process for minimizing the negative impact of state budget cuts on Long Term Services and Supports when the maintenance of effort requirement under the Affordable Care Act expires;

* Establish Olmstead benchmarks for states to assure that they adhere to minimum standards for providing effective community-based alternatives to institutions and withhold Medicaid funding from states that fail to meet such benchmarks;

* Work with the Department of Justice to align the complaint processes used by the HHS Office for Civil Rights and the Department of Justice so complaints to eliminate the need for DOJ to re-investigate complaints that have already been investigated by HHS;

* Assure that implementation of managed care or other changes in Medicaid at the state level promote community living and self-direction and do not undercut Medicaid recipients’ rights to appeal decisions and have appropriate hearing rights including aid continuing;

* Work with the ADAPT to strengthen the Community First Choice (CFC) Option and assure that CFC implementation lives up to its promise.

* Develop a process to assure that HHS reviews its policies and procedures to identify how it can assure compliance with the ADA’s integration mandate;

HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT
The President should instruct HUD Secretary Shaun Donovan to:

* Immediately disseminate the Olmstead guidance that was shared with ADAPT in January 2013 without any weakened language;

* Implement an improved system to track nursing facility transition vouchers to assure that these vouchers continue to be used for this purpose when they are returned;

* Include people with disabilities in nursing facilities and institutions within the definition of “homeless”;

* Develop a package of pre-approved policies, procedures and other necessary documentation that housing authorities can simply adopt in order to implement preferences or set-asides for people with disabilities seeking community living; and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

* Develop and distribute guidance that individuals with disabilities who are seeking to leave institutions and live in the community must be granted a reasonable accommodation that allows them to receive the next available voucher in order to transition.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE
The President should instruct Attorney General Eric Holder to:

* Immediately pursue Olmstead enforcement addressing the institutionalization of people with disabilities – of all ages – in nursing facilities;

* Instruct the Civil Rights Division to meet with representatives of ADAPT and the National Council on Independent Living to develop a plan to address the concern of retaliation at the state and local level which is under-cutting the availability of supports from this unique network of disability-led organizations; and

* Meet with members of ADAPT to better understand the disability community's concerns about the Olmstead implications of Department of Labor's proposed changes to the "companionship exemption" and include ADAPT in a meeting with the Office of Management and Budget to address this issue.

Dear Bruce, can you please advise me on how to disabuse Senator Harkin's office that this is in any way the position of Consumer Directed IHSS Consumers in California. As you know so well, we had our own advocates meeting with Donna Aguilar of the Office of Management budget to let her know about how destructive the negative unintended consequences of the DOL rules deal well rules would be here in California and the widespread misery that would be created on the day it would be enacted. I will attach -mails during below of our communications to Donna Aguilar of OMB beneath your e-mail, so that Andrew Imperato might convey our true sentiments to the Senator.

Subj: Revised Oped Unintended Consequences: Collateral Damage of the Homecare Rules
Dear Editor;

In your editorial, "Homecare Rules in the Homestretch," you fail to understand the reality of living on government funded Medicaid and the Russian Roulette pistol aimed at the heads of the Seniors, People with Disabilities and our Home Care Workers who depend on it, every year when budgets are cut. Although overtime pay would be great for IHSS providers, in publicly funded Medicaid programs, states that are cutting IHSS (In Home Supportive Services) are not likely to provide overtime pay and will instead most likely cut hours worked above 160 hours a month for any one provider. There is a big move to push through these Department of Labor rules as written right now with no consideration of how they'll really play out in the homes of Seniors and People with Disabilities and their Caregivers in New York and California where people have over 159 hours of IHSS a month.

I know of a proud union member, a mother over 60, who has multiple disabilities of her own and takes care of her adult son with athetoid cerebral palsy who will see her household income of about $2520 a month in California drop to $1431, as her hours are cut from 280 hours a month to 160 hours. She doesn't have the stamina to supplement her income with more jobs and she has trouble finding other caregivers because her son cannot be understood very well by others. The union has taken over $40 a month from her for check each month to lobby for what will cut her income by a pretty big fraction. 70% of the caregivers in California are family members whose households stay intact with IHSS. A cut in hours can threaten their ability to stay in their homes. Seniors and People with Disabilities with Live in Caregivers will be uprooted as well. Jerry Brown just got done settling a lawsuit trying to cut the IHSS program in California by 20% and settled for cutting it by about 8 percent. Do you really think he's going to take time and a half for over 50,000 providers? His representative on an Olmsted conference said they wouldn't.

When I was in the Young Socialist Alliance in college, before I had my accident, I believed in theories in a vacuum. Then I became disabled and saw how these things work out on a real-life level. In California, we have the most highly advanced In-Home Supportive Services program, and the reason it was so good is that the disabled person received money to find somebody and all of that money went directly to the caregiver. The attendant got all the bang for the buck. And while ADAPT American Disabled for Attendant Programs Today was fighting to get In Home Care, this wonderful program to all the states, they came up with things like "Money Follows the Person" and "Community First Choice Option" where that money continued to go to the disabled person to pay directly to their caregiver with no middleman.

But suddenly all kinds of profiteering is going on as big bad corporations and yes even sometimes big bad unions behaviors are immerging as monied interests smell a beautiful dollar to be made in the graying of the baby boomers. On a good day the union is our greatest blessing on a bad day they are our greatest curse. The only way to come up with a reasonable solution that takes everyone's welfare into account is to sit down and work it out. I think what's been most frightening to me in all of this is the ease with which able-bodied regard People with Disabilities as invisible. The SEIU would not even sit down at the table with People with Disabilities to work out a compromise. Would this happen to a person of color? Are we the last population to be seen as a fraction of a person -- or a person who is really there at all?

People have been making industries of people with disabilities for decades, in the nursing home industry, the charity industry, and now the medical industrial complex and the unions too on a bad day. People from ADAPT clawed our ways out of nursing homes that were profiteering off of us and now we have to fight against the nursing agency industry, managed care corporations, and even at times a union that is so out of touch with its rank and file providers needs that it would create three crappy jobs from one not so good one in order to collect two or three union dues on a one house. It is the people disabilities and rank-and-file providers, who are in a symbiotic relationship, huddled together to keep industries and unions from objectifying us and moving us around like "furniture" in their business plans. You can choose to be naïve and come up with lovely little fairy lands in your own mind, but make no mistake, your naïveté will be paid for by the rank-and-file workers whose pay will be cut badly and people with disabilities who will go back to nursing homes.

The ADAPT-NCIL compromise would simply eliminate the exemption for third party employers, treating Medicaid consumers in consumer directed programs (including public authorities, fiscal intermediaries and agencies with choice) the same as private employers so they can still use the existing exemption. According to the DOL analysis, this change - alone - would eliminate the companionship exemption for 70% of home care workers. It covers all of the "bad players" and concerns raised in the DOL analysis that exist in traditional home care while minimizing the negative impact on people with disabilities and preventing the unexpected consequences such changes would have on real live people in Medicaid funded programs.

Where were our points of view in this newspaper? In the DOL discussions? Why include us? It's only our bodies, our civil rights, our freedom from living lives akin to political prisoners in iinstitutions! If anyone had any respect for people with disabilities we would have included us in the discussion.

Subject: Home Care Rules in the Home StretchWhat this NY Times editorial fails to acknowledge is that California has had the most generous home care program for poor people in the United States for several decades - In-Home Supportive Services. Today, IHSS pays about 380,000 home care workers - 72 percent of whom are family members - to serve about 440,000 people. Throughout that time, the workers have been paid minimum wage. The issue in California is how the OVERTIME regs will affect both IHSS consumers and workers. Neither your analysis nor that of the DOL has considered that as drafted these regs will significantly damage this consumer-directed program. Yes. The state of California AND many IHSS consumers and workers oppose these regs on monetary grounds. Because they point toward both service reductions and less income for households where family workers provide the assistance. We are not part of the home care AGENCY industry world. But none of you have truly understood the uniqueness of IHSS and the unnecessary damage these regs will perpetrate.

string, but I think it will give you some background on some of the concerns those of us who are and advocate for Seniors and Persons with Disabilities in California: The IHSS Consumers Union, The San Francisco Public Authority, Members of the Managed-Care Committee of the Los Angeles County Public Authority and the Arc of California, the largest membership association for all people with intellectual and developmental disabilities and their families would very much like to speak with you. We have serious concerns regarding the unintended negative consequences that could occur for Seniors and Persons with Disabilities in the state of California if the Department of Labor rules regarding the Companionship Exemption are applied to publicly funded Medicaid programs.

Thank you for your dedication in serving our country.

In California where 70% of caregivers are family providers, IHSS makes it possible for families to stay intact when they have a senior family member or a family members with a disability, who needs in-home care. These families could see their household income drop dramatically.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Significantly disabled people with over 160 hours could lose loyal live-in and live out caregivers they've had for decades, because their work hours will be cut below the money they need to live. Or people with severe disabilities may not be able to get providers to help them when one of the providers needs to leave, because the remaining providers will be in danger working overtime. The unintended consequences of this unbalanced approach to the way private and public in-home supportive services are paid could lead to widespread misery in publicly funded In-Home Supportive Services.

Senior and Disability Rights Advocates were not included in discussions where these Department of Labor rules were developed. Now, the National Council on Disability is trying to explain this to those who can make a difference. Their letter is printed below. The NCIL/ADAPT compromise could be a win-win solution for everyone, where privately funded agencies would have different rules than in publicly funded Medicaid In-Home Supportive Services in states where finite revenues determine what can be paid. "Our compromise creates a win-win solution, covers 70% of attendants and allows us all to be at the table for further discussion," says Bruce Darling of CDR ADAPT.

Below see the Letter from the National Council on Disability about these possible negative unintended consequences. http://www.ncd.gov/publications/2013/03192013/ The Disability and Senior communities and the rank-and-file IHSS providers in New York and California do not seem to of been fully informed or permitted to give input about the impact of this law as written. If after reading this letter, you feel the Office of Management and Budget should delay changing these rules until they consult with Disability And Senior Communities and make sure it won't cut the number of hours providers are permitted to work in publicly funded programs, then sign the petition at the link above or make your comments here at Capitol Hill's Congress blog http://thehill.com/blogs/congress-blog/economy-a-budget/286539-act-now-on-fair-wages-for-home-care-aides and DIRECT letters to letters@nytimes.com

As more sign-on letters are developed for the Office of Management and Budget OMB, we will give you other opportunities to voice your opinions, but time is running short before these proposed laws will become what we try to live with. United in win-win solutions for Home Care Workers and Seniors and Persons with Disabilities!

"The disability community is deeply concerned that the proposed changes will have a negative impact on people with disabilities, consumer direction and our attendants. Medicaid rates are not going to increase so attendant hours will be capped. DOL - in its own analysis - identified that instutionalization was an outcome of these rules. Are you aware of our concerns? Do you really think Medicaid rates are going to increase to coveer the cost of time-and-a-half? Appreciate your insights as to how this would - practically - move forward. -- Bruce Darling ADAPT"

From Michael Condon -- STOP THE UNINTENDED CONSEQUENCES

My name is Michael Condon I'm a disabled Veteran, paralyzed from the neck down for the last 40 years. I live in San Diego, CA, in a home I rent,and I am assisted by a caregiver paid for by In-Home Supported Services (IHSS). IHSS employs nearly 400,000 caregivers across the State. Almost 50% of these caregivers currently work more than 40 hrs/week. In addition, 70% of the IHSS caregivers in this program care for family members, many of whom require protective supervision (24 /7 care).

The State has neither the funds nor the inclination to pay overtime. This will put me, and hundreds of thousands like me, at risk of institutionalization. Because our caregivers will be limited to a 40 work week, I will be forced to have multiple caregivers while there are already not enough to meet the current need. Please do not institute the DOL regs. requiring overtime. The disabled, elderly and blind on...this program would love to have their caregivers receive time and a half, but that will not happen. What will happen (unintended consequences) instead, the caregivers hours will be cut driving many deeper into poverty. The caregiver loses, the senior/disabled loses and the Unions almost double their membership dues.

Sincerely.

Michael Condon

This is why a 40 hour work week mandate is bad. It will be financially devastating to 46% of IHSS IP's (190,000 workers)in CA alone.

I ask all who signed my petition to please call the White House (202-456-1414) & ask for the Office of Information & Regulatory Affairs (OIRA) at the Office of Management and Budget (OMB). OMB is currently reviewing the FLSA change & is set to release it April 1st. We need to tell OMB to reject it & thereby save home care workers & the people we assist. Comments can be made to OMB through OIRA.
The name of the regulation is FLSA Domestic Service Regs (29CFR 552 and the ID at OMB is RIN# 1235-AA05
Unfortunately that phone number is not released to the public so we must call the White House switch board. For more information call me, Philip Bennett: 718-339-0404
And please share my petition with as many people as possible. I love my job & I want to afford to keep doing it & I don't want to see more people forced into nursing homes. Thank you!

Please forward to Brenda Aguilar. Thank you.

Main Topics: Candidates' Wives, Offshore Drilling, McSame

Summary of Shift: The debate over offshore drilling continues with pundits from local to national weighing in on the effects and timeline of removing the moratorium. Today begins a back and forth between the McCain and Obama camps over the legitimacy of attacking their spouses. Obama announces that he will opt out of the public financing system. Floodwaters in the Midwest have yet to recede and the Army Corps of Engineers says that up to thirty levees may be at risk.

Highlights:
1) Candidates Wives

Candidates' Wives May Be Fair Game, Especially if You Are Using Their Jet (MSNBC 06/19/08 9:39am)
[Clip of Cindy McCain on Good Morning America commenting on Michelle Obama's "proud" remark]

CHRIS JANSING: [reading remark from the McCain camp] "Senator McCain agrees with Senator Obama that spouses should not be an issue in this campaign. Unfortunately, when the DNC was attacking Mrs. McCain, he was not . . . strong enough to stand up and speak out against the outrageous charges leveled at her by his party chair, Howard Dean. Obama's silence speaks volumes." Andrea, should the guys back off on this then?

ANDREA TANTAROS: No, look, you know, I think that's absolutely true. This isn't a one-way street here. Both Candidates have seen their wives come under scrutiny. Cindy McCain under scrutiny for the cookies that she baked . . . look, I think if both spouses are going to be used on the campaign trail, which they are, they are fair game. . . they absolutely are. For the Obama campaign to say, "No, hands off" . . . I think that was a mistake . . .the man may be the head of the White House in this situation but the woman's going to be the neck . . . it's in the context of what fair game?

LAUREN SCHWARTZ: . . . when McCain's people put out that statement about the DNC leveling charges against Cindy McCain, I think it's important to look at what those charges are because there's a legitimate issue and concern that both the Democratic National Committee and GOP lawyers have raised. And that is when John McCain was suffering economically in his campaign last summer, he used Cindy McCain's corporate jet to fly in for McCain events that he has not yet reimbursed for that travel and that violates the means of his own campaign finance reform. I was a trip director to Theresa Heinz-Kerry and she had a private plane that we used every day that was methodically credited back and the campaign paid for that use. And that is a legitimate issue and Cindy McCain is of course involved in that because it was her company's jet that John McCain was flying on. So I think it's important to put in context those legitimate issues like the DNC and GOP lawyers have been talking about for the last week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Making the Candidates' Wives Fair Game is Tantamount to Enacting a Policy of Mutually Assured Destruction (MSNBC 06/19/08 6:14am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: The thing is, while Cindy McCain and others have kind of been poking at Michelle Obama, trying to gain an advantage and perhaps it is gaining advantage in states like West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio . . . it is what military strategists termed during the Cold War, basically the political equivalent of . . . Mutually Assured Destruction.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: I agree

SCARBOROUGH: If you go after wives you may gain a short term advantage, but in the end, you are assuring your own destruction.

Cindy Gets Out of Her Usual "Designer Suits and Pearls" to Help Out Operation Smile (ABC 06/19/08 7:15am)
KATE SNOW: This is the Cindy McCain you don't see on a campaign stage. No pearls, no designer suit, at a hospital on the coast of Vietnam helping Operation Smile screen children to see if they qualify for a life changing surgery. She got involved years ago, after adopting a daughter from Bangladesh who needed the same operation.

[…]

Cindy McCain hasn't done a lot of interviews until recently. The latest ABC News poll found that fewer Americans had a favorable opinion of her than Michelle Obama, and more than a third said they had no opinion of McCain. There seems to be this mystery about you, people don't know you.

CINDY MCCAIN: I don't think I'm very mysterious. I've just lead my life differently, and I'm not the candidate, I've never been front and center. I do the things that I enjoy, I do the things that are important to me, and do them in a way that I like to do them.

SNOW: If they say, she's just kind of up there and posing, what would you say to people who think that?

MCCAIN: Get to know me! I'll talk to them.

SNOW: Her husband, the senator, has been actively courting women voters. But women's rights groups say that once women discover that he is anti-abortion, they may change their minds. So why should women support her husband?

MCCAIN: Well, supporting our troops the way he does, supporting our young men and women, right now, who are serving so gallantly is very pro-women, because every mother, wife, sister, aunt, feels the way I have felt. The things that he does doesn't make him any more pro-women, pro-man, or anti-anything. He's about America, he's about making America strong, America strong is good for all of us.

SNOW: Would you feel safe with Barak Obama as your president?

MCCAIN: I would feel safe with my husband as president. I think Barack Obama is a fine man. I think Michelle Obama is a fine women. This is about who would be better, and I think my husband would be better.

Fallout in FL on Drilling May Pale in Comparison to Gains in Other Swing States (MSNBC 06/19/08 6:40am)
JOHN HARWOOD: I want to say one thing about oil. I do not think it's a winning position in Florida per se but John McCain's up eight points in Florida . . . what John McCain is playing to is . . . Ohio and Pennsylvania and Michigan and these blue-collar voters who say, oil's four dollars a gallon right now, do something different . . . I think that John McCain has the potential to be on to something here because we're in a new circumstance on energy and I think he's adjusting to it . . . when you see not only John McCain but Charlie Crist going, people say he's playing to be John McCain's vice president, maybe so, but still he's a Florida politician. Would he take that position if it were so toxic right now? I'm not sure?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[. . .]

PAT BUCHANAN: I think John Harwood is exactly right . . . $4 a gallon gasoline, everybody talking about . . . energy independence . . .so McCain says that's right, we've got to throw out some of the old ideas and really move forward aggressively . . . I think McCain is moving toward a winning position . . . I think that's a stronger position than don't disturb the caribou up there in Alaska . . . and let the Chinese drill off the coast of Florida.

Newt Ginrich Pushes For Drilling, Applauds McCain's Sudden Change on the Issue (FNC 06/19/08 8:31am)
BRIAN KILMEADE: Hey Mr. Speaker, I'm wondering how this whole issue, we're talking about oil, gas, drilling, and we know the success you're having with your petition. But has John McCain, in your mind, played this issue correctly? He's diametrically opposed, the opposite to where Barack Obama stands.

NEWT GINRICH: Well, I think Senator McCain's moved in the right direction. He's come out for drilling, he's for clean coal technology, he's for nuclear power, he's for alternative fuels including wind power and solar power. So he's clearly moving to a position that we ought to have more production and lower costs, and I think that's a pretty powerful contrast with Senator Obama, who is apparently sticking with a higher regulation, higher tax, and higher price which I think, frankly, is a losing hand in the long run.

McCain's Drilling Plan Brings Him Closer to Bush (CNN 06/19/08 7:22am)
JOHN ROBERTS: Sen. McCain's new stance on offshore drilling than one he had just a few years ago. It is now a stance that mirrors President Bush's. Something he has been trying to avoid. . .

ED HENRY: Republican John McCain is trying to appeal to independent voters by saying he's no President Bush.

JOHN MCCAIN: The next president must be willing to break with the energy policies not just of the current administration but the administrations that preceeded it . . .

HENRY: A fascinating family drama . . . it was the president's father who signed that order banning offshore drilling while his brother Jeb . . . opposed such drilling as governor of Florida. Colbert's Word Mocks McCain as Being Same as Bush (Comedy Central, 06/18/08, 11:40pm)
STEPHEN COLBERT: It's no secret that one of John McCain's biggest challenges as a candidate is to distinguish himself from President Bush. I'm not sure why he's so eager to spurn the President's supporters. I mean that's walking away from almost 29 percent of the American electorate, and nearly half the Bush children. But he's so different than Bush already. The only issues they agree on are education, immigration, Iraq, abortion, supreme court judges, social security, tax breaks for the wealthy, wire tapping, trade, health care, the Middle East, same-sex marriage, and Medicare. But, they could not be further apart on Katherine Heigl's feud with her Grey's Anatomy producers. Luckily, John McCain has found away to put distance between himself and the President, and it's tonight's word. Lexicon artist. Folks, language is very important in politics, particularly when it comes to war. (Weapons of mass description) For years, the Bush administration used the words, "war on terror". Which was replaced with the names, "global war on terror". (Bush loves nicknames) Then it was the "global struggle against extremism" then briefly it was the "long war" before they settled on the new name, "hey, maybe we should bomb Iran." (The "maybe" proves they're diplomats) To prove, to prove that he's his own man, John McCain has his own words to describe America's ongoing conflicts. See if you can spot it.

[Various McCain "We're facing a transcendental challenge" clips shown]

That's right. The war is now transcendental. (Transcends voter approval) No surprise, after all Toby Keith's anti-terrorists lyric, "we'll put a boot up your ass, it's the American way" originally appeared in Henry David Thoreau's

"Walden". Now there are some questions about McCain's new buzz word, it's not entirely clear what he's trying to say. (Another way he's like Bush) Now, does he mean, does he mean transcendent? Which, according to Webster's means "exceeding usual limits?" Because the war has certainly exceeded the time limit. (And the Constitution) Or is he intentionally using the word transcendental? Which is defined by Webster's as "of or relating to experience as determined by the mind's makeup." In which case he's saying the war on terror is all in our heads. (Along with Cheney's buckshot) Now maybe, maybe, he didn't mean to describe a transcendental experience at all, maybe we misheard him because he was having trouble with his dentures. (Fixodental challenge) Now clearly, clearly transcendental has too many interpretations. John McCain needs to come up with a new word. (Retirement?) You know what, Shakespeare, I mean think of it folks, Shakespeare invented words all the time. He invented over 1,200 words including, and this is true, accused, torture, and zaney. (From play "much Abu about Ghraib") Now everybody knows I've coined a few words myself. Truthiness. Wikiality. (Explitive)-turn. Which I can not define due to a pending lawsuit. (And upcoming Fox reality show) So, Senator, Senator let me help you. From now on, keeping our troops in the Middle East isn't just necessary to win the war. It's downright "Iraq-rosanct". (Iraq-rosanct) Holding people indefinitely at Abu Ghraib is "divine inter-detention." (Divine inter-detention) And secretly sending prisoners to other countries where torture is legal is no longer extraordinary rendition. It's called "offshore drilling." (Offshore drilling) Now I hope those help, because using language to turn failed policies into ideals that transcend debate is the best way to get people to think of you as "transcen-presidential." (Transcen-Presidential!) And that's the word.

Joy Behar Proclaims McCain is Same as Bush and People Have Had Enough! (CNN, 06/18/08 10:30pm)
LARRY KING: How close is this race going to be?

JOY BEHAR: How close? I think that Obama is going to have a landslide, but I don't want to say it because I want him to be the underdog.

KING: You just said it!

BEHAR: But I do believe that. I do believe it. I think, you know, that people are really going to come to their senses and realize that John McCain, and I'm just repeating what everybody else says, but I believe it. That he is just more and more of George Bush and people have had it! I mean how many more times do we have to get smacked in the face by the Bush administration before people say, enough!?

And I don't know if you've read about this, but there are a lot of people who think you would make a great vice presidential running mate for John McCain. To all those people who say, yeah she would be on my short list too, what do you say to them?

CONDOLEEZA RICE: Well, thanks very much, obviously it's dearly flattering to have people think that way. But, no, it's time for me to go back to Stanford, I mean 8 years is a long time, particularly in the circumstances that we've gone through. I am quite certain that Senator McCain is going to find a really great running mate. He, himself, is a terrific patriot and he's a good friend. But it's time for me to do something else.

DOOCY: Oh, come on, you'd like the job.

RICE: No, no I wouldn't. Government service is a wonderful thing, Steve, but you have to know when your time is up, and it's time for new blood and let us leave. I've got six months still to try to complete some of the important tasks the administration's taken on. The President's got a very active agenda, we're going to sprint to the finish. And then I'm going to sprint back to the west coast.

Daily Telegraph:
Barack Obama's team is briefed by Bush staff on after warnings about a terrorist attack
Senior aides to Barack Obama have been meeting George W.Bush's staff to begin planning a smooth transfer of power.

By Tim Shipman in Washington
Last Updated: 9:26PM BST 18 Oct 2008

Officials from both campaigns have been asked to briefings after warnings from US intelligence that terrorists and rogue states will seek to exploit the power vacuum following November's presidential election.

For the first time in American history the FBI has begun vetting likely officials of the next administration before the election, to ensure they have security clearance to deal with crises on day one.

Intelligence chiefs expect an attempt to emulate the terrorist strikes on Britain when Gordon Brown took power and are concerned that Russia or Iran could use the 77 days of paralysis between the election and the inauguration on January 20 for acts of international brinkmanship, like the invasion of Georgia.

An official involved in the transition discussions told The Sunday Telegraph: "There has been no specific threat but the assessment is that someone will try something.

"It could be a terrorist attack on US assets overseas. It could be the leader of a rogue state chancing his arm. Putin and Ahmadinejad have form."

The transition of power in the US is a chaotic process. More than 1,100 political appointees in senior posts have to be approved by the Senate, a process that can take months.

On Wednesday the current White House chief of staff, Josh Bolten, chaired a meeting of senior White House staff and representatives of both Mr Obama and his Republican rival John McCain.

President Bush's creation of this Presidential Transition Coordinating Council, the earliest ever, is designed to avoid a repeat of the situation on September 11 2001, when only one third of his national security appointees had been approved by the Senate, nine months into his presidency.

Martha Kumar, director of the White House Transition Project, an independent group that advises the transition teams of both campaigns, told The Sunday Telegraph: "The times of changing of power are soft times, times of vulnerability. Just look at what has happened around the world, including in Great Britain.

"You had the failed bombings in London and then the attack at Glasgow airport three days after Gordon Brown took office. In Spain the Madrid bombings were three days before the presidential election."

There have been particularly intensive efforts to make sure Mr Obama has his national security team in place, not just because he is widely expected to win the election on November 4, but because intelligence analysts believe America's enemies are more likely to try to take advantage of Mr Obama's international inexperience than they would of Mr McCain.

A senior official in the Obama camp, whose name has been submitted for FBI vetting, said: "We will be ready and we will be seen to be ready."

He said that Mr Obama is close to finalising plans for his first 100 days in power - which will include major moves on the economy, healthcare and Iraq in his first week, designed to make his priorities clear to Americans.

He is planning a series of early interventions to stamp his authority on the economic crisis. This will include legislation proposing a $300bn stimulus package which would be published before President Bush has even left the White House, so that it can be passed as soon as he takes power.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr Obama is also planning executive orders that do not require legislation on his first day in office, which could include plans to promote renewable energy resources and create jobs.

His transition team, which is reportedly much more extensive and active than Mr McCain's, features 10 working groups in different policy areas to convert campaign promises into concrete legislation. It is chaired by John Podesta, Bill Clinton's former White House chief of staff who runs the Centre for American Progress, a think tank long seen as a Democratic administration in exile.

Mr Podesta is working closely with Michael Signer, a former foreign policy aide to John Edwards in charge of homeland security affairs. Mr Podesta and Jason Furman, one of Mr Obama's two most influential economic advisers, have already held talks with sceptical conservative Democrats to line up the votes to pass a stimulus package.

Mr Obama has also worked to cultivate a close relationship with the Treasury Secretary, Henry Paulson, and personally asked him to help out during the transition, sparking speculation that he might keep Mr Paulson in post for the first year of his presidency.

Ms Kumar said: "There are things that a president can do immediately that establish his brand of leadership and help establish with the public what the priorities are.

"Reagan issued executive orders at the luncheon following the inauguration. He didn't even wait to get to the White House. He wanted to show how seriously he took the issue of the economy."

FBI vetting is also under way on 100 people from both campaigns, including Susan Rice, expected to be made the second successive black woman national security adviser after Condoleezza Rice; Greg Craig, a Washington lawyer tipped to become Mr Obama's chief White House counsel and his likely White House chief of staff; and the former senator and campaign chairman Tom Daschle. If Daschle prefers to become Health Secretary, Obama's current chief of staff Pete Rouse, nicknamed the 101st Senator for his connections on Capitol Hill, would take the job.

Other key national security officials will include Denis McDonough, chief foreign affairs adviser to the campaign and Richard Danzig, a secretary of the Navy under Clinton.

John Kerry, the Democratic candidate four years ago, and his fellow senator Chris Dodd, a failed candidate this year, are vying to become Secretary of State.

Mr Kerry, an Army veteran, is also a contender to take control of the Pentagon, but many expect that post to go to a Republican, perhaps the maverick senator Chuck Hagel. Colin Powell, a former secretary of state and chairman of the joint chiefs could return to government if he endorses Obama, as many expect. The veteran Democratic Senator Sam Nunn's name is also in the frame.

Dear Jake,

Attached is my speech at AIPAC yesterday to the Rabbinical Assembly, the organization of Conservative American Rabbis, on rising anti-Semitism in Europe; the Iran nuclear negotiations; and U.S.-Israel relations.

I would like to suggest for Secretary Clinton that on the most sensitive issue, Iran, she be generally supportive of an agreement along the lines I outlined, but, crucially, she indicate (a) grave concerns that Iran's missile program is unconstrained and has no civilian purpose, and that we should make its restraint a priority; (b) that Congress should pass additional sanctions after an agreement that could be imposed by a future President following the 10-15 year expiration period of the agreement, if Iran seeks a "breakout" at that point. In other words, one major flaw in the emerging agreement is that Iran would be free of constraints after the period. She should take the position that unless Iran radically changes its posture over this period of time, the U.S. should never allow Iran to become a nuclear weapons state, as North Korea is now.

This position would be supportive of the Obama Administration's efforts, but would signal a tougher position on what a post-agreement world should look like.

Best wishes,

Stu

CNN: “Rand Paul blasts Clinton, Obama policy on Syria”

By Ashley Killough

August 28, 2014, 1:25 p.m. EDT

Sen. Rand Paul continued his recent blitz against Hillary Clinton as a “war hawk,” blasting the former secretary of state for having a “shoot first” foreign policy.

In an opinion piece for the Wall Street Journal, the Kentucky Republican highlighted Clinton’s advocacy to arm Syrian rebels when she was the nation’s top diplomat.

The militant Islamist group known as ISIS originated from the Syrian opposition forces, and Paul argues that those who sought to arm the rebels and help unseat Syrian President Bashar al-Assad may have done more harm than good.

“We aided those who've contributed to the rise of the Islamic State,” he said.

The Obama administration didn’t agree to send weapons until after Clinton left office, and it only sought to aid moderate elements among Syria’s opposition groups.

There’s been no clear indication, however, that U.S. assistance to Syrian rebels have directly benefited ISIS in a significant way.

Paul, who labeled Clinton a “war hawk” in a recent interview with NBC News, said Clinton was “eager to shoot first in Syria before asking some important questions.”

“We are lucky Mrs. Clinton didn't get her way and the Obama administration did not bring about regime change in Syria,” he continued. “That new regime might well be ISIS.”

CNN reached out to Clinton's spokesperson for comment but did not receive a response. Adrienne Elrod, spokesman for the pro-Clinton group Correct the Record, argued in a written statement that Paul's "belief in extreme isolation" is "wrong for our country, our people and our place."

While the United States has conducted air strikes against ISIS in Iraq, the administration has now taken steps that signal it could take similar action against ISIS in Syria.

Falling in line with his non-interventionist views, Paul said it would be “more realistic” to recognize that while some regimes are bad, they may be helping keep stability in a country.

“There are evil people and tyrannical regimes in this world, but...America cannot police or solve every problem across the globe,” he wrote.

While he didn’t offer any specific solutions moving forward, he detailed how he would handle the solution in a separate interview.

“If I were in President Obama’s shoes at this time, I would have called Congress back, I would have had a joint session of Congress, and I would have said ‘this is why ISIS is a threat to the United States, to the stability of the region, to our embassy, to our diplomats, and this is why I’m asking you today to authorize air attacks,’” he told the conservative news outlet Breitbart.

New York Times: “Hillary Clinton Praises Obama on Ferguson Response and Echoes Call for Inquiry”

By Amy Chozick

August 28, 2014

Nearly three weeks after the shooting of Michael Brown prompted widespread protests in a St. Louis suburb and a national examination of race and police tactics, Hillary Rodham Clinton on Thursday praised President Obama’s response to the episode and called for a swift investigation into the circumstances that led to the unarmed black teenager’s death.

In a paid speech at a technology conference in San Francisco, Mrs. Clinton said she watched the funeral of Mr. Brown, the 18-year-old who was shot by a white police officer in Ferguson, Mo. “As a mother, as a human being, my heart just broke for his family,” she said.

“But I also grieve for that community and for many like it across our country,” said Mrs. Clinton, a potential Democratic presidential candidate in 2016. “Behind the dramatic, terrible pictures on television are deep challenges that will be with them and with us long after the cameras move on.”

On Sunday, as Mrs. Clinton finished up a book signing for her memoir “Hard Choices” in the beach community of Westhampton, N.Y., she declined to respond to news media inquiries about Ferguson.

Mrs. Clinton had been criticized for not speaking out on the subject. On Thursday, she weighed in with extended remarks that included praise of Mr. Obama for deciding to send Attorney General Eric H. Holder Jr. to Ferguson, and for having demanded a swift investigation into the circumstances that led to Mr. Brown’s death.

“That’s both appropriate and necessary to find out what happened, to see that justice is done, to help this community begin healing itself,” she said.

She also invoked the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and said, “We can’t ignore the inequities that persist in our justice system.”

A grand jury is considering evidence into the actions of Officer Darren Wilson, who shot Mr. Brown. Officer Wilson has received support from those who say he has been portrayed as guilty in news media coverage without the benefit of a trial.

Mrs. Clinton, who earns roughly $200,000 per speech, challenged the largely white audience to "imagine what we would feel, what we would do if white drivers were three times as likely to be searched by police during a traffic stop as black drivers, instead of the other way around," or if one-third of all white males "went to prison during their lifetime."

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Hillary Clinton Cites Racial Inequities in First Ferguson Comments"

By Peter Nicholas

Hillary Clinton, in her first public comments on a police officer's shooting of an unarmed black teenager in Ferguson, Mo., said that policing must be rooted in "trust" and "professionalism" rather than "fear," and that African-Americans face "inequities" in the nation's judicial system that whites would never tolerate.

As a likely Democratic presidential candidate, Mrs. Clinton was under growing pressure to address the rioting that engulfed the St. Louis suburb after Michael Brown's death nearly three weeks ago.

In a speech in California Thursday, she said that her "heart just broke for [Mr. Brown's] family because losing a child is every parent's greatest fear."

The clashes between police and demonstrators, she said, reflect the "deep challenges" that Ferguson confronts.

"This is what happens when the bonds of trust and respect that hold any community together, fray," she said. "Nobody wants to see our streets look like a war zone. Not in America. We are better than that," she added.

Broadening the point, Mrs. Clinton said the criminal justice system is proving unfair to minorities.

She mentioned that whites would never put up with a system that made them three times more likely to be searched by police in a traffic stop –the reality confronted by black drivers.

Invoking Rev. Martin Luther King's "I have a dream" speech, she said the nation must "make the dream real for all Americans."

"And that mission is as fiercely urgent today as when he [Dr. King] stood on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial in the hot August sun all those years ago.

"So we have a lot of work to do together."

Mrs. Clinton didn't directly criticize a police response in Ferguson that relied on military-style equipment and tactics.

But she hinted at a better approach when she commended "decent and respectful law enforcement officers who showed what quality law enforcement looks like."

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Hillary Clinton on Ferguson: 'We are better than that'"

By Sean Sullivan

Former secretary of state Hillary Clinton, weighing in for the first time on the controversial shooting death of Michael Brown, said Thursday that she grieves for both Brown's family and his community, and called for better than what occurred in the chaotic aftermath of the shooting in Brown's hometown of Ferguson, Mo.

Clinton's remarks came nearly three weeks after Brown, an unarmed black teenager, was shot dead by a white police officer. She adopted a careful tone and avoided singling out any one person or entity for blame in an incident that has sparked a national debate over issues of race and the use of force by authorities.

"We can do better. We can work to rebuild the bonds of trust from the ground up," Clinton said.

The potential 2016 presidential candidate applauded President Obama for sending Attorney General Eric Holder to Ferguson, a decision she called "both appropriate and necessary."

Clinton made her remarks at a summit in San Francisco hosted by the data storage company Nexenta. Her comments on events in Ferguson came well after most other prominent politicians weighed in on the shooting and its aftermath.

Brown was fatally shot by Ferguson police officer Darren Wilson on Aug 9. Authorities are still probing details of the shooting, which sparked intense clashes between protesters and police that received widespread attention.

"This is what happens when the bonds of trust and respect that hold any community together fray," Clinton said. "Nobody wants to see our streets look like a war zone. Not in America. We are better than that."

Clinton said her "heart just broke" for Brown's family. "Losing a child is every parent's greatest fear and an unimaginable loss," she said, adding that she also grieves for the city of Ferguson.

Clinton encouraged Americans not to ignore "inequities that persist in our justice system."

"Imagine what we would feel and what we would do if white drivers were three times as likely to be searched by police during a traffic stop as black drivers, instead of the other way around," she said.

The former secretary of state encouraged Americans to join each other in the process of healing after the Ferguson shooting.

"We should all add our voices to those who have come together in recent days to work for peace, justice and reconciliation in Ferguson and beyond," said Clinton.

Martin Luther King Jr.'s "I Have a Dream" speech, Clinton said, should resonate with people and spur them to renew his mission.

"It was 51 years ago today that Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. called us to live out the true meaning of our creed, to make the dream real for all Americans," she said. "And that mission is as fiercely urgent today as when he stood on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial in the hot August sun all those years ago."

Associated Press: "Clinton Says Frayed Trust Led to Ferguson Violence"

By Haven Daley

August 28, 2014, 5:54 p.m. EDT

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) – Hillary Rodham Clinton broke nearly three weeks of silence Thursday on the fatal police shooting of an unarmed 18-year-old in Missouri, saying his death and the violent protests that followed resulted from frayed bonds of trust in a racially divided community.

The remarks by the former secretary of state during a speech to a technology group were her first about Michael Brown's Aug. 9 death in the St. Louis suburb of Ferguson.

As a potential Democratic presidential candidate, Clinton was criticized for waiting so long to talk about the shooting of Brown, who was black, by a white police officer after a midday confrontation on a street.

Clinton lamented the shooting and the numerous tense confrontations that followed between angry protesters and heavily armed police.

"This is what happens when the bonds of trust and respect that hold any community together fray," she said. "Nobody wants to see our streets look like a war zone. Not in America. We are better than that."

She said America cannot ignore inequalities in its justice system.

"Imagine if white drivers were three times as likely to be searched by police during a traffic stop as black drivers, instead of the other way around," she said, or "if white offenders received prison sentences 10 percent longer than black offenders for the same crimes."

Clinton noted that higher percentages of black men go to prison compared to white men.

"That is the reality in the lives of so many of our fellow Americans and so many of the communities in which they live," she said. She said Martin Luther King Jr.'s call for racial equality "is as fiercely urgent today" as it was decades ago.

Civil rights activist Al Sharpton was among those who chastised Clinton and other politicians for waiting weeks to discuss the events in Ferguson. Sharpton said Clinton and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, a potential GOP presidential candidate, should not "get laryngitis on this issue."

Politico: "Hillary Clinton makes first Ferguson remarks"

By Maggie Haberman and Katie Glueck

August 28, 2014, 3:15 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton on Thursday made her first public remarks on the racial unrest in Ferguson, Mo., saying that "we cannot ignore the inequities" in America's justice system and "we can do better" than what happened with the shooting of Michael Brown and its aftermath.

Clinton made the comments at a paid speech in San Francisco at the Nexenta OpenSDx Summit, where she was the keynote speaker. It was the first official public appearance she has made since Brown was shot multiple times by a white police officer in the St. Louis suburb.

Her remarks were measured. Clinton acknowledged the pain of the Brown family's loss and the disturbing visuals of the protests after the shooting. But she was also respectful toward police officers, a community that backed Clinton in her reelection fight in 2006 in the Senate from New York.

"Imagine what we would feel, what we would do if white drivers were three times as likely to be searched by police at a traffic stop as black drivers, instead of the other way around," she said. "If white offenders received prison sentences 10 percent longer … if a third of all white men — look at this room, take one third — went to prison during their lifetime. Imagine that."

But that's the reality in many communities around the country, Clinton said.

She praised President Barack Obama's decision to send Attorney General Eric Holder to Ferguson and the president's calls for a "thorough and speedy investigation," which is "both appropriate and necessary to find out what happened, to see that justice is done, to help this community begin healing itself."

The Rev. Al Sharpton pressed Clinton the weekend after the shooting to speak out about issues of race in the country. She has been on vacation for much of the last two weeks since the shooting, save for three book signings. At her last one, in Westhampton, N.Y., she ignored two reporters' questions about her response to the issue. Other African-American leaders, such as Rep. John Lewis (D-Ga.), had suggested that Democrats who were not speaking out were doing so to allow Obama to be the main voice as the president.

"Watching the recent funeral for Michael Brown as a mother and as a human being, my heart just broke for his family, because losing a child is every parent's greatest fear and an unimaginable loss," she said.

"But I also grieve for that community and for many like it across our country. Behind the dramatic, terrible pictures on television are deep challenges that will be with them and with us long after the cameras move on. This is what happens when the bonds of trust and respect that hold any community together fray. Nobody wants to see our streets look like a war zone, not in America. We are better than that."

Clinton added, "We saw our country's true character in the community leaders who came out to protest peacefully and worked to restrain violence, the young people who insisted on having their voices heard, and in the many decent and respectful law enforcement officers who showed what quality law enforcement looks like, men and women who serve and protect their communities with courage and professionalism, who inspire trust rather than fear.

"We need more of that, because we can do better. We cannot ignore the inequities that persist in our justice system, inequities that undermine our most deeply held values of fairness and equality," she said.

"We can do better. We can work to rebuild the bonds of trust from the ground up. It starts within families and communities.," she said.

She tried to give sweep to her comments, saying, "It was 51 years ago today that Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. called us to live out the true meaning of our creed, to make the dream real for all Americans. And that mission is as fiercely urgent today as when he stood on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial in the hot August sun all those years ago."

Clinton also worked in a mention of the tech firm hosting her. “At Nexenta you say better living for a better world. At the Clinton Foundation we say we’re all in this together. If you put those together, it comes out to a pretty good road map for the future,” she said. “And we need all of you, your energy and your efforts, your innovation, your building, your creating to help us achieve that better world.”

CNN: “Hillary Clinton breaks silence on Ferguson”

By Dan Merica

August 28, 2014, 3:15 p.m. EDT

(CNN) - Hillary Clinton broke her silence Thursday on the protests over the death of an unarmed black teenager in Ferguson, Missouri, telling an audience of technology investors that the United States "can do better."

Her statement, which came at the end of her prepared remarks to the Nexenta OpenSDx Summit, was the first time Clinton spoke about the protests since they began earlier this month, and her comments came after civil rights leaders had called on Clinton to weigh in.

"Watching the recent funeral for Michael Brown as a mother, as a human being, my heart just broke for his family because losing a child is every parent's greatest fear and an unimaginable loss," Clinton said. "But I also grieve for that community and many like it across our country. Behind the dramatic terrible pictures on television are deep challenges that will be with them and with us long after the cameras move on."

Brown was shot dead earlier this month by a police officer in the St. Louis suburb. The shooting sparked large protests that were accompanied by looting and a sizable police presence.

Michael Brown's funeral: Hope, tears and a call for social change

The former secretary of state and prohibitive favorite for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016 has avoided questions about Ferguson since the protests began. At a book signing in Westhampton, New York on Sunday, Clinton did not respond to two reporters’ questions about Brown's killing.

Clinton’s statement on Thursday struck a balance between grieving with Brown's family and highlighting some of the positive police work that occurred in Ferguson around the protests.

"This is what happens when the bonds of trust and respect that hold any community together fray," Clinton said at the event in San Francisco. "Nobody wants to see our streets look like a war zone, not in America. We are better than that."

Rand Paul on Ferguson: Police too militarized

Clinton also applauded President Barack Obama for his response to Ferguson, which included a statement on the killing and the dispatching of Attorney General Eric Holder to the suburb.

"We can do better," Clinton said. "We cannot ignore the inequities that persist in our justice system. Inequities that undermine our most deeply held values of fairness and equality."

She continued: "Imagine what we would feel and what we would do if white drivers were three times as likely to be searched by police during a traffic stop as black drivers instead of the other way around. If white offenders received prison sentences ten percent longer than black offenders for the same crimes. If a third of all white men – just look at this room and take one-third – went to prison during their lifetime. Imagine that. That is the reality in the lives of so many of our fellow Americans in so many of the communities in which they live."

In the weeks after the shooting, civil rights and black thought leaders had called on Clinton to comment on Ferguson. At a rally earlier this month about the killing, Rev. Al Sharpton, a civil rights leader and host on MSNBC, said, "Jeb Bush, Hillary Clinton, don't get laryngitis on this issue. … Nobody can go to the White House unless they stop by our house and talk about policing."

Marc Lamont Hill, a CNN commentator, said Clinton's decision to "ignore the question and to not proactively and assertively address the issue is shameful."

On Thursday, Clinton cited the life of Martin Luther King Jr. as a guide to how the United States should respond to the protests in Ferguson.

"It was 51 years ago today that Martin Luther King Jr. called us to live out the true meaning of our creed, to make the dream real for all Americans," Clinton said. "And that mission is as fiercely urgent today as when he stood on the steps of the Lincoln memorial and the hot august sun all those years ago."

Clinton supporters, like CNN contributor Donna Brazille, heralded the statement as both timely and needed. "

"She's right, we can do better," said Brazille, who added that she didn't counsel Clinton on the statement. "It's time we start to take the necessary steps to build one America so everyone can enjoy the American Dream."

Not all were satisfied with the timing of Clinton's statement, however.

"Hillary Clinton offers a statement on Michael Brown and Ferguson. 19 days later," Hill tweeted in response to the speech. "Next she'll offer her thoughts on Rodney King and Vietnam."

Wall Street Journal blog: Venture Capital Dispatch: "Hillary Clinton Tells Tech Execs Not Everyone Sharing in Industry Gains"

By Deborah Gage

August 28, 2014, 6:37 p.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton on Thursday told a tech industry conference in San Francisco that new technologies were helping to drive a U.S. economic recovery but that not enough people were sharing in the gains.

Speaking at a conference sponsored by Nexenta Systems Inc. where everyone who attended received a signed copy of her latest book, "Hard Choices," Mrs. Clinton declined to say whether she would run for president. She said she would be working hard this fall to make sure that Democrats don't lose the Senate and can maintain "a decent balance" in the House.

The bulk of her speech centered on the technology industry's role in the U.S. economy. She frequently praised Silicon Valley in the well-received speech, which ended with a standing ovation from the several hundred attendees.

Mrs. Clinton cited new technologies like cloud computing and "software-defined everything," which she said are "helping businesses operate more efficiently and effectively at the same time that they increase productivity and profit and are helping to drive economic recovery."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She also praised what she called "a revolution" in domestic energy production and the "mountains of data generated by life in the 21st century" as major U.S. competitive advantages.

Better use of data has already created new tools for farmers and truckers, more efficient supply chains and improvements in health care, she said. She praised "experts in Silicon Valley" for helping to fix the flawed rollout of the Obama administration'shealthcare.gov website and said that "going forward, the government could use more of your expertise" since it is "woefully behind in all policies that affect tech."

Still, she said, despite the promises of technology, "the historic link between productivity gains and wage gains" has been lost in the U.S., and "too many are losing ground and losing hope."

She called on the tech community to embrace "a classic American public-private partnership" to help the country remain competitive and provide more equal opportunities for all.

"I believe it's still true that a lot of families in America today are hurting from the great recession, and communities are coming apart at the seams, and the American dream of opportunity and equality feels out of reach," she said.

Ms. Clinton also made her first public comments on the recent killing of a young black man by police in Ferguson, Missouri, which sparked racially charged protests. As she watched the funeral of Michael Brown, "my heart broke for his family. Losing a child is every parent's greatest fear and an unimaginable loss."

She said she grieved for Ferguson and "every community like it across the country…Nobody wants to see our streets look like a war zone—not in America. We're better than that."

After her speech, Mrs. Clinton was interviewed on stage by Nexenta Systems Inc. Chief Executive Tarkan Maner, answering questions on a wide range of foreign and domestic topics. Mr. Maner said the session was not scripted and he was told he could ask whatever he wanted.

An active Democrat who did business with the State Department at his previous company, Wyse Technology (now part of Dell Inc.), Mr. Maner told Venture Capital Dispatch that he wanted to see more women involved in tech. He declined to discuss Mrs. Clinton's fee, which is undisclosed.

Here are excerpts from their discussion:

On Edward Snowden:

After 9/11, "there's no doubt we went too far in a number of areas," Mrs. Clinton said, adding there needs to be a robust debate about balancing privacy and liberty with security. "People need to be involved. And finally we need to make it clear to other countries that our tech companies are not part of the government…I think there needs to be a global compact about surveillance and information. The U.S. government does not use information for commercial purposes but others do."

On women in tech:

She said most of the solution to the gender imbalance in the technology industry rests with the private sector. She cited a cultural bias or discouragement against girls and women and praised Google Inc. for combining job listings with personal outreach to urge women to apply. "I've hired a lot of men and women in my career, and oftentimes women need convincing."

On immigration reform:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reform is needed, she said, but “given the great recession where so many people have lost jobs, there has to be extra effort to try to fill the jobs with people who are already here. If that’s not possible you can make a good faith argument that you tried.”

On repatriating foreign earnings:

Tech earnings were repatriated when she was in the Senate, but too many companies did not put the extra money they received from lower taxes to productive use, she said. She is checking into a proposal by Cisco Systems Inc. CEO John Chambers and others to have companies invest a percentage of their repatriated earnings in an infrastructure bank to repair airports and ports and increase broadband access.

On gun control:

Citing the death this week of a gun instructor in Arizona who was accidentally shot by a 9-year-old girl: “We need a concerted public effort to rein in the extremists on gun control.”

Wall Street Journal blog: CIO Journal: “Hillary Clinton Talks Tech in San Francisco”

By Rachael King

August 28, 2014, 6:28 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton, Thursday, emphasized the importance of technologies such as Big Data and cloud computing in helping to drive economic recovery in the U.S. Speaking at a technology conference in Silicon Valley, Mrs. Clinton addressed a wide range of subjects including HealthCare.gov, government surveillance and the challenges the government faces in its use of technology.

Advances in technology are helping businesses operate more efficiently and effectively, she said. “They’re better serving their own customers, but at the same time increasing productivity and profits and helping to drive our economic recovery.”

Mrs. Clinton acknowledged, though, that not enough people were sharing in the gains of that economic recovery, wrote VentureWire’s Deborah Gage. Despite the promises of technology, “the historic link between productivity gains and wage gains” has been lost in the U.S., and “too many are losing ground and losing hope,” said Mrs. Clinton.

Still, she asserted that Big Data is helping to make business and government more efficient. Mrs. Clinton noted that the United States is home to one-third of all data in the entire world. “I think that’s a major competitive advantage,” she said, citing a McKinsey estimate that the productivity gains unlocked by Big Data could add hundreds of billions of dollars to the gross domestic product of the United States.

“The potential savings and improvements in the healthcare sector alone are staggering,” she said. Mrs. Clinton cited a recent report about how the increased costs in Medicare seem to have slowed down and even begun to decrease, in part because of better use of data and more effective understanding of what works and what doesn’t work. Under the Affordable Care Act, the government is seeing many of the same results, she said.

She acknowledged that the government still faces many challenges with the use of technology, both in its day-to-day operations and in projects like HealthCare.gov. “Let’s face it, our government is woefully behind in all of its policies that affect the use of technology,” she said. She noted Silicon Valley’s role in helping to fix HealthCare.gov and put the Affordable Care Act back on track. “Going forward, the government could use more of your expertise on the front end, designing and launching programs rather than coming in afterward to help save them,” she said.

Mrs. Clinton shared her views on a wide range of technology issues:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Government surveillance “Moving from what we did in response to 9/11, which in many respects was just scrambling around trying to figure out how we get information that protects us and our friends around the world, there’s no doubt that we may have gone too far in a number of areas and those have to be rethought and we have to rebalance.”

Foreign spying Surveillance is everywhere, not just the U.S. “Every time I went to countries like China or Russia, we couldn’t take our computers, we couldn’t take our personal devices, we couldn’t take anything off the plane,” she said, adding, “I think there needs to be a global compact about surveillance and about information and what it’s used for.”

Women in tech “The government can do some things more stem education for girls and women, but most of the solution rests with the private sector,” she said. “We’ve gone backwards, we had more women graduating in STEM subjects 30 years ago than today.”

Repatriation of Foreign Money Cisco Systems Inc. CEO John Chambers and others business leaders have floated a proposal to invest a percentage of repatriated profits into an infrastructure bank to do everything from repairing airports and sea ports to expanding broadband access. She hasn’t yet vetted the idea, but she said it’s interesting. “It doesn’t do our economy any good to have this money parked somewhere else in the world.”

Mrs. Clinton spoke at the OpenSDx Summit sponsored by Nexenta Systems Inc., a software-defined storage startup company.

New York Times: “Democrats Wary of Benghazi Inquiry Stretching Into ’16 Election Season”

By Jonathan Weisman and Jennifer Steinhauer

August 28, 2014

WASHINGTON — A House Republican-led investigation of the 2012 terrorist attack on an American diplomatic compound in Benghazi, Libya, will extend well into next year, and possibly beyond, raising concerns among Democrats that Republicans are trying to damage Hillary Rodham Clinton’s presidential prospects.

Representative Trey Gowdy, Republican of South Carolina and the chairman of the House select committee on Benghazi, said his go-slow investigation was not motivated by politics. He said that he had gone out of his way to maintain good relations with Democrats on the committee, asking Representative Elijah Cummings of Maryland, the panel’s ranking Democrat, to join him in private meetings in July with family members of the four Americans killed in Libya in July.

“I promised the family members of the four slain and my colleagues on both sides of the aisle the investigation would be serious and fair,” Mr. Gowdy said in an email. “Nothing would undercut both of those promises like an orchestrated timing.”

But concern is rising, both among Democrats and among those who note that most select committees tend to conclude far more quickly. For instance, the select bipartisan committee to investigate the response to Hurricane Katrina in 2005 took a year from its formation to complete a 361-page report. The bipartisan commission that examined the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, took a year and a half.

The Benghazi committee, which was formed in May, could take much longer, and leaders are budgeting as much as $3.3 million for the investigation this year alone, a sum greater than the entire budget of the House Intelligence Committee. Mr. Gowdy said he would spend less than that, and he has set the panel’s first public hearing for September, to review enactment of the State Department’s security recommendations after the attack. Other than that, there have been few outward signs of progress.

After the midterm elections two months away, Republican attention is likely to shift sharply to Mrs. Clinton, the secretary of state at the time of the deadly assault and a possible Democratic presidential contender for 2016.

"If it walks like a duck and quacks like a duck, it probably is a duck," said Phil Singer, a former Clinton campaign aide. "It's hard to look at the timing and think it's simply a coincidence that it would wrap up in the heart of the presidential campaign."

Mr. Cummings said the chairman had repeatedly assured him politics would play no part in the investigation. But, he noted, the House Intelligence Committee completed its own investigation of the attacks this month, the seventh inquiry into the matter.

"The question now is what is left to investigate, and I do not think we need until 2016 to answer it," he said.

The attack on the compound in Benghazi, which took the life of a United States ambassador, J. Christopher Stevens, has outraged the Republican Party's most conservative voters.

But Mr. Gowdy's methodical, under-the-radar approach has offered up little for partisans to seize upon, at least for now.

He said the investigation should be complete by the end of 2015, "assuming cooperation from agencies, witnesses and the administration." Mr. Gowdy added, "I say 'should' because we cannot predict what witnesses will say, what documents may be produced, and whether either will lead to additional lines of appropriate inquiry."

He added, "Just as I did not sign up for nor have any interest in a political investigation, likewise I have no interest in half measures, partial productions or a lack of access to witnesses with relevant information."

To Democrats, such deliberation is suspicious in light of what is already known. Representative C. A. Dutch Ruppersberger of Maryland, the ranking Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee, said a declassified version of his panel's Benghazi report could be released in September. He said the committee found no intelligence failure ahead of the attack. Intelligence agents did warn of increased threats but "had no specific tactical threat" before the Sept. 11, 2012, attack, he said. And there was no "stand down" order issued to military officers to hold off a rescue.

"There was no illegal activity, no illegal arms sales occurring, and no evidence the intelligence community assessments were politicized in any way," he said. "If there are any more facts to be found, I'm all for it, but how much further can you go?"

Last week, Mr. Gowdy hired the retired Lt. Gen. Dana K. Chipman, the Army's former top lawyer, to be the committee's chief counsel. Jamal Ware, a former House Intelligence Committee spokesman, was brought on to handle communications.

Mr. Gowdy defended the length of time he expects the investigation to take. "I know it seems too logical for members of Congress, but the length of any investigation is dependent upon the level of compliance from others," he said. "The documents are in many instances in the custody of others, and the schedules of potential witnesses are completely outside of our control."

But the committee's senior Democrats appear to be losing what enthusiasm they could muster when they reluctantly agreed to serve on it.

"I am not sure what the committee can productively do that hasn't been done already," said Representative Adam B. Schiff, Democrat of California, a member of the select committee and the House Intelligence Committee. But, he added, "These committees tend to take on a life of their own."

TROMSO, Norway – Anyway, back to chess …

When we left off in our last column we had described the proxy fight between the West and Russian President Vladimir Putin over the leadership of the world chess federation.

Mr. Putin prevailed, with his preferred candidate defeating one of his fiercest critics, former world chess champion Garry Kasparov, and handing him a victory on the cultural front.

Earlier this month, Mr. Kasparov spoke about his underdog campaign in an interview during the world chess team tournament hosted by this Arctic city (an event inexplicably ignored by the major TV networks). He also made plain he has no great sympathy for the way President Barack Obama is managing the showdown with Mr. Putin in Ukraine.

"If Obama and (British Prime Minister David) Cameron were leading their respective countries in the 1980s, I would still be playing chess under the Soviet flag," said Mr. Kasparov, who grew up in the old Soviet Union and who now lives in Manhattan. "We see reactions, but we do not see leadership."

That gets at an important question: Do American voters grasp the stakes involved in the conflicts roiling the Middle East, Asia and – well – virtually anywhere else you look? Are they prepared to elevate foreign policy to a central issue in the 2016 presidential campaign?

That's not the norm. Pocketbook concerns are typically what animate American voters in presidential races. Yet there are signs that what's happening abroad will have more urgency when Americans pick a successor to Mr. Obama.

Images are powerful things and the gruesome video of a hooded Islamist State thug beheading American journalist James Foley could drive home to everyday Americans that the extremist group's march across Iraq and Syria is very much their concern.

What's more, the potential candidates seem primed to confront one another on foreign policy once the '16 race starts up. In her interview this month with the Atlantic, Democrat Hillary Clinton indicated she would be far more interventionist than Mr. Obama. In pointed terms, she suggested the president missed the moment when he failed to arm the moderate Syrian rebels fighting Syrian leader Bashar al-Assad at an earlier stage.

She said "the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled."

Dismissing one of the more colorful tenets of Mr. Obama's foreign-policy approach — "Don't do stupid stuff" — she said the phrase doesn't amount to "an organizing principle" for "great nations."

Mrs. Clinton's muscular vision of the U.S. role in the world could create one of the sharpest general election differences between herself and a potential Republican opponent.

Consider Rand Paul. On "Meet the Press" this week, the Kentucky Republican senator said Mrs. Clinton was looking like a "war hawk." Mr. Paul has called for slashing foreign aid and has shown a wariness toward military engagements.

"If you wanna see a transformational election in our country, let the Democrats put forward a war hawk like Hillary Clinton, and you'll see a transformation like you've never seen," Mr. Paul said.

Doubling down, he wrote an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal on Thursday that took aim at Mrs. Clinton for wanting to "shoot first in Syria before asking some important questions." Calling her an "interventionist," Mr. Paul wrote that toppling Mr. Assad might only have cleared a path for extremists fighting to gain power in Syria.

As Grandmaster Kasparov might put it: Mrs. Clinton moved a piece and Mr. Paul countered. It's game on.

New York Magazine blog: Daily Intelligencer: "The Race To Make Hillary Clinton More Liberal Is On"

By Jonathan Chait

August 28, 2014, 4:37 p.m. EDT

The 2016 Democratic presidential campaign is beginning to take shape. It's a highly unusual campaign. Hillary Clinton commands the massive party loyalty of an incumbent, except she's not an incumbent, so it is possible for another Democrat to challenge her without the campaign necessarily signalling the all-out, you-have-failed opposition of a Gene McCarthy in 1968, Ted Kennedy in 1980, Pat Buchanan in 1992, and so on. The campaign, instead, is likely to center on organized liberals using a candidacy to pressure Clinton not to move too far toward the center.

Three developments this week have given that campaign a more visible shape:

1. Bernie Sanders looks like a likely candidate. "I'll be going to New Hampshire, and I'll be going to Iowa," he told the Hill. "That's part of my trying to ascertain the kind of support that exists for a presidential run." Sanders plans to run on a left-liberal economics program: "a 'massive jobs program,' raising the minimum wage, changing the nation's trade policies, programs to make childcare and college education more affordable, and subsidized healthcare."

2. Elizabeth Warren — a possible opponent who has been more coy than Sanders but has pointedly left the door open — was asked about Israel at a town-hall meeting. A constituent compared Israel's counterattack in Gaza to that of the police in Ferguson. Warren struck a surprisingly hawkish tone:

Warren told [the questioner] she appreciated his comments, but "we're going to have to agree to disagree on this one."

"I think the vote was right, and I'll tell you why I think the vote was right," she said. "America has a very special relationship with Israel. Israel lives in a very dangerous part of the world, and a part of the world where there aren't many liberal democracies and democracies that are controlled by the rule of law. And we very much need an ally in that part of the world."

Warren said Hamas has attacked Israel "indiscriminately," but with the Iron Dome defense system, the missiles have "not had the terrorist effect Hamas hoped for." When pressed by another member of the crowd about civilian casualties from Israel's attacks, Warren said she believes those casualties are the "last thing Israel wants."

"But when Hamas puts its rocket launchers next to hospitals, next to schools, they're using their civilian population to protect their military assets. And I believe Israel has a right, at that point, to defend itself," Warren said, drawing applause.

If Warren runs, her candidacy seems less likely to be the vehicle for dovish foreign-policy critics of Clinton. Or, at least, that campaign will have a significant omission on Israel.

3. One of the most gaping opportunities against Clinton might have been Ferguson and police discrimination, where liberals — especially African-Americans — have expressed outrage, and Clinton has kept silent. Today, Clinton spoke about Ferguson and closed that gap:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We can't ignore the inequities that persist in our justice system that undermine our most deeply held values of fairness and equality," she said.

"Imagine what we would feel and what we would do if white drivers were three times as likely to be searched by police during a traffic stop as black drivers, instead of the other way around," Clinton said. "If white offenders received prison sentences 10 percent longer than black offenders for the same crimes. If a third of all white men—just look at this room and take one third—went to prison during their lifetime. Imagine that. That is the reality in the lives of so many of our fellow Americans and so many of the communities in which they live."

So, where does the Democratic campaign stand? As of now, there appear to be possible avenues for a left-wing challenge on economics. A challenge to push her on social issues or foreign policy has not yet emerged on the horizon.

Politico: "Paul Ryan ahead of Hillary Clinton in one race"

By Jake Sherman

August 28, 2014, 2:30 p.m. EDT

Rep. Paul Ryan finished ahead of Hillary Clinton — at least on the newest New York Times Best Seller list.

The Wisconsin Republican's newest book, "The Way Forward," will debut at No. 5 on the nonfiction hardcover best-sellers list, one spot ahead of Clinton's "Hard Choices," according to an advance copy of the list provided to POLITICO.

Ryan is on a nationwide publicity tour for the book, which wraps up Friday night with a speech at the Reagan Library in Simi Valley, California.

Ryan's publisher, Twelve — an imprint of Hachette Book Group — says Bookscan shows he has sold 6,266 copies of the book. That number does not capture all sales, and the publisher says approximately "12,000 units were sold" last week. The publisher said sales were impacted by the spat between Amazon and Hachette — the book was not available for pre-order.

Clinton's book sold more than 85,000 copies in the first week — exponentially more than Ryan's book.

To: "Shulman, Holly" <ShulmanH@dnc.org >

Tonight Marco Rubio will say that "yesterday is over, and we are never going back." But Marco Rubio's policies suggest the exact opposite. Rubio's policies are a repeat of the tired Republican playbook – tax cuts for the wealthiest at the expense of hardworking families, repealing the Affordable Care Act and returning power to the insurance companies, opposing marriage equality, and opposing a woman's right to choose. Marco Rubio would erase the progress we have made and turn back the clock for women, for young people, for Latinos, and for the middle class.

Backwards for the hardworking families: Rubio's tax plan would lower taxes on corporations and raise tax rates for hardworking Americans.

Backwards for women: Rubio voted against reauthorizing the Violence Against Women Act. He opposes equal pay legislation, saying it was "wasting time." Rubio has declared that he would oppose a woman's right to make her own health care decisions "even if 100 percent of my constituents were for it."

Backwards for young people: Marco Rubio voted to block a bill that would allow students to refinance their student loans.

Backwards for Latinos: Marco Rubio ran away from his own immigration reform package, bowing to political pressure, and he wants to end deportation relief that is keeping families together.

Family, not the government, is the most important institution in our society.
All human life deserves protection of our laws
All parents deserve to choose the education that's right for their children—strong people and strong nation.

If America once again accepts the mantle of global leadership—by abandoning concessions to Iran and hostilities to Israel
Hollowing out of the military, Vets
No longer being passive in the face of Russia and China

Generational choice about what kind of choice families will have.
Just yesterday, a leader from yesterday began a campaign for president by promising to take us back to yesterday.
Yesterday is over. We're never going back. Proud of our history, but our country has always been about the future.
Can't go back to the leaders and ideas of the past.

NPR: "Henry Kissinger's Thoughts On The Islamic State, Ukraine And 'World Order'"

Henry Kissinger was a Harvard scholar before he became a mover and shaker in the world of foreign policy. And in his new book, World Order, the former secretary of state under Presidents Nixon and Ford gives a historian's perspective on the idea of order in world affairs.

Nations are always trying to establish systems to make the world a more orderly place, but they rarely last for long. His book stretches from China under the emperors, Rome surrounded by barbarians and Islam encircled by infidels, to the treaties of Europe and the pivotal positions of Russia and Iran.

On current affairs, Kissinger tells NPR's Scott Simon why a conflict with the Islamic State, also known as ISIS, is more manageable than a confrontation with Iran, what he would do about the Islamic State, and what he thinks the best solution is for the crisis in Ukraine.

On why he views Iran as a "bigger problem than ISIS"

There has come into being a kind of a Shia belt from Tehran through Baghdad to Beirut. And this gives Iran the opportunity to reconstruct the ancient Persian Empire — this time under the Shia label — in the rebuilding of the Middle East that will inevitably have to take place when the new international borders [are] drawn. Because the borders of the settlement of 1919-'20 are essentially collapsing.

That gives Iran a very powerful level from a strategic point of view. I consider Iran a bigger problem than ISIS. ISIS is a group of adventurers with a very aggressive ideology. But they have to conquer more and more territory before they can became a strategic, permanent reality. I think a conflict with ISIS — important as it is — is more manageable than a confrontation with Iran.

On what he would do about ISIS

They have cut the throat of an American on television. This is an insult to the United States, which requires that we demonstrate that this is not an act that is free. I would strongly favor a strong attack on ISIS for a period that is related to the murder of the American.

Then, we have to go into the long-range problem. I think when we are dealing with a unit like ISIS, we should not get into a position where they can lead us by establishing ground forces. But we should set strategic objectives where we thwart any goal they set themselves, which we should be able to do by superior air power. And then, if we can enlist other countries, or other more local groups to do the ground fighting, we might actually destroy them.

On the "Russian enigma" and what he thinks Putin's Russia wants

The attitude of the West and of Russia towards a crisis like Ukraine is diametrically different. The West is trying to establish the legality of any established border. For Russia, Ukraine is part of the Russian patrimony.

A Russian state was created around Kiev about 1,200 years ago. Ukraine itself has been part of Russia for 500 years, and I would say most Russians consider it of Russian patrimony. The ideal solution would be to have a Ukraine like Finland or Austria that can be a bridge between these two rather than an outpost.

Kissinger's reaction to naysayers because of his role during the war in Vietnam, especially the bombing of Cambodia and Laos

They should study what is going on. I think we would find, if you study the conduct of [the military], that the Obama administration has hit more targets on a broader scale than the Nixon administration ever did. And, of course, B-52s have a different bombing pattern.

On the other hand, drones are far more deadly because they are much more accurate. And I think the principle is essentially the same. You attack locations where you believe people operate who are killing you. You do it in the most limited way possible. And I bet if one did an honest account, there were fewer civilian casualties in Cambodia than there have been from American drone attacks.

The Vietnam War was a great tragedy for that country. And it is now far enough away so that one can study [it] without using the slogans to see what really happened. And I believe you would find — my position was that of the chief of staff of the president — that the decisions that were taken would almost certainly have been taken by those of you who are listening, faced with the same set of problems. And you would have done them with anguish, as we did them with anguish.

On whether he thinks Hillary Clinton would be a good president

I know Hillary as a person. And as a personal friend, I would say yes, she'd be a good president. But she'd put me under a great conflict of interest if she were a candidate, because I tend to support the Republicans.

... Yes, I'd be comfortable with her as the president.

SCOTT SIMON, HOST:

Henry Kissinger was a scholar before he became a mover and shaker. And in a new book, he traces the idea of order and world affairs - how nations try to establish systems to make the world a more orderly place. It usually doesn't work out that way for long. His new book, "World Order," stretches from China under to the emperors, the treaties of Europe to the pivotal position of Russia and Iran today. We spoke with the former secretary of state last week shortly after news that James Foley - the U.S. journalist - had been beheaded by militants from the Islamic State also known as ISIS. Mr. Kissinger said that in all the crises roiling the world, the U.S. shouldn't lose focus on Iran.

HENRY KISSINGER: There have come into being a kind of a Shia-belt from Tehran through Baghdad to Beirut. And this gives Iran the opportunity to reconstruct the ancient Persian Empire, this time under a Shia label. From a geo-strategic point of view, I consider Iran a bigger problem than ISIS. ISIS is a group of adventurers with a very aggressive ideology. But they have to conquer more and more territory before they can become a geo-strategic, permanent reality. I think a conflict with ISIS - important as it is - is more manageable than a confrontation with Iran.

SIMON: What would you do about ISIS?

KISSINGER: They have cut the throat of an American on television. This is an insult to the United States, which requires that we demonstrate that this is not an act that is free. I would strongly favor a strong attack on ISIS for a period that is related to the murder of the American. Then, we have to go into the long-range problem. SIMON: Let me ask you about a couple of other areas of the world. You spent a considerable time in this book writing about what you call the Russian enigma. What's your reading of what Vladimir Putin's Russia wants?

KISSINGER: The attitude of the West and of Russia towards a crisis like Ukraine is diametrically different. The West is trying to establish the legality of any established border. For Russia, Ukraine is part of the Russian patrimony. A Russian state was created around Kiev about 1,200 years ago. The ideal solution would be to have a Ukraine like Finland or Austria that can be a bridge between these two rather than an outpost.

SIMON: Mr. Kissinger, every time we interview you, we hear from people who object, who say they have no interest in your opinion because of your role during the war in Vietnam, especially the bombing of Cambodia and Laos. How do you answer that?

KISSINGER: They should study what is going on. I think we would find, if you study the conduct of guerilla-type wars, that the Obama Administration has hit more targets on a broader scale than the Nixon Administration ever did.

SIMON: Is there not, though, a difference between a drone attack and carpet bombing?

KISSINGER: Of course. When you - B-52s have a different bombing pattern. On the other hand, drones are far more deadly because they're much more accurate. And I think the principle is essentially the same. You attack locations where you believe people operate who are killing you. You do it in the most limited way possible. States?

KISSINGER: Yes, I'd be comfortable with that president.

SIMON: Henry Kissinger. His new book - "World Order." Thanks so much for being with us.

Washington Post blog: In The Loop: "Did Kissinger endorse Clinton for president? Almost."

By Colby Itkowitz

September 7, 2014, 12:48 p.m. EDT

It's been a bit of a love fest between former secretaries of state Henry Kissinger and Hillary Clinton the past week. They shared a stage at the groundbreaking of the State Department's new Diplomacy Center, Clinton wrote a glowing review of Kissinger's new book, and then President Richard Nixon's foreign policy adviser on Saturday offered an (almost) endorsement for a Clinton presidency.

Kissinger, a controversial figure in American diplomatic history, was asked during an NPR interview whether Clinton would make a good president.

"I know Hillary as a person. And as a personal friend, I would say yes, she'd be a good president," Kissinger said. "But she'd put me under a great conflict of interest if she were a candidate because I intend to support the Republicans."

NPR reporter Scott Simon asked whether, putting partisan politics aside, Kissinger would be comfortable with a Clinton White House.

"Yes, I'd be comfortable with that president," Kissinger said. But then he added, "You've just lost me I don't know how many friends."

Which begs the question, how many friends would it cost Clinton to have Kissinger, reviled by the antiwar movement during the Vietnam War, as an advocate?

This isn't the first time that Kissinger has heaped praise on Clinton. In 2008, when it was rumored that Barack Obama would pick her as his secretary of state, Kissinger was all in. "She is a lady of great intelligence, demonstrated enormous determination and would be an outstanding appointment," he said during a speech in India.

But liberals, who worry that Clinton is too hawkish on foreign policy, have raised an eyebrow at the presumptive Democratic front-runner's cuddly relationship with Kissinger. David Corn at Mother Jones described Clinton's embrace of Kissinger as evidence of "how low she can go" to win the White House.

And the former diplomats' friendship adds fuel to the other end of the political spectrum occupied by libertarian Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.). Paul is largely anti-intervention and is eager to run for president against Clinton, whom he has dismissed as a "war hawk."

Which leads to another question: If Paul is the GOP nominee against Clinton, will Kissinger still vote Republican?

The Atlantic: "Hillary, Elizabeth Warren, and Israel"

By Jeffery Goldberg

September 7, 2014, 9:05 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Why Hillary Clinton's hawkish pro-Israel stance won't hurt her, even with the Democratic Party base

Shortly after I posted my interview with Hillary Clinton last month, I began hearing from liberal Democrats who were worried that her hawkish comments—on Syria, but especially on the Gaza war—would somehow provoke a primary challenge from her left (these conversations proceeded from the assumption that Clinton is running for president, which is a reasonable assumption). The Democratic Party base, the theory went, would be so offended by Clinton's vociferous pro-Netanyahu positioning that it would agitate on behalf of a primary challenge. Elizabeth Warren, the populist Massachusetts senator, was the most likely candidate for the role.

As a reminder, here is some of what Clinton said about Israel and Gaza:

"Israel was attacked by rockets from Gaza. Israel has a right to defend itself. The steps Hamas has taken to embed rockets and command-and-control facilities and tunnel entrances in civilian areas, this makes a response by Israel difficult. Of course Israel, just like the United States, or any other democratic country, should do everything they can possibly do to limit civilian casualties."

And this:

"If I were the prime minister of Israel, you're damn right I would expect to have control over security [on the West Bank], because even if I'm dealing with Abbas, who is 79 years old, and other members of Fatah, who are enjoying a better lifestyle and making money on all kinds of things, that does not protect Israel from the influx of Hamas or cross-border attacks from anywhere else. With Syria and Iraq, it is all one big threat. So Netanyahu could not do this in good conscience."

Tough stuff, and not the sort of thing you would have heard from her publicly when she was yelling at Benjamin Netanyahu on behalf of President Obama for the past several years. After the interview, I came to a few conclusions about these statements:

1. They were made on purpose, as was every statement she made in the interview, including the line that got the most attention: "Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

2. They were made with the knowledge that she faces no serious foreign policy-focused challenge from her left. She does face a more serious and sustained critique from the left on domestic issues, but she felt that going hawkish on foreign policy would be low-risk.

3. They were made with knowledge that there are segments of the pro-Israel community that still mistrust her for kissing Mrs. Arafat a million years ago.

4. She believes what she said. She is just naturally more hawkish than the president she served as secretary of state.

I'm now glad to report—only because I'd rather be right than wrong, all things being equal—that Elizabeth Warren has confirmed for us that, on questions related to Israel, Clinton has nothing to fear from her, at least.

At a town-hall meeting on Cape Cod last month, Warren answered critics of her vote in favor of a Senate measure to send an additional $225 million in military funding to Israel during the war. Here is a report on the town-hall meeting from the Cape Cod Times:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"'I think the vote was right, and I'll tell you why I think the vote was right,' [Warren] said. 'America has a very special relationship with Israel. Israel lives in a very dangerous part of the world, and a part of the world where there aren't many liberal democracies and democracies that are controlled by the rule of law. And we very much need an ally in that part of the world.'

"Warren said Hamas has attacked Israel 'indiscriminately,' but with the Iron Dome defense system, the missiles have 'not had the terrorist effect Hamas hoped for.' When pressed by another member of the crowd about civilian casualties from Israel's attacks, Warren said she believes those casualties are the 'last thing Israel wants.'

"'But when Hamas puts its rocket launchers next to hospitals, next to schools, they're using their civilian population to protect their military assets. And I believe Israel has a right, at that point, to defend itself,' Warren said, drawing applause."

Even if Elizabeth Warren chooses to run (unlikely), she won't run as a tough-on-Israel liberal. There's just no percentage in it. Hillary knew what she was doing.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Romney: 'No question' I'd be a better candidate than Hillary Clinton"

By Kevin Cirilli

September 7, 2014, 9:54 a.m. EDT

Mitt Romney said Sunday that he'd make a better president than Hillary Clinton, although he is not planning on running.

Romney, the former 2012 Republican presidential candidate, insisted that he's not running for president in 2016. But that didn't stop him from comparing himself to Clinton, the presumed Democratic frontrunner.

"Would you make a better president than Hillary Clinton?" Fox's Chris Wallace asked Romney in an interview with "Fox News Sunday."

"No question about that in my mind," Romney answered. "Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama are two peas in the same pod."

Romney also said he'd have made a better president than Barack Obama, too.

Romney criticized Clinton and Obama for their foreign policy decisions, particularly their response to the Sept. 12, 2012, attack at a U.S. post in Benghazi, Libya.

"This doesn't just land at the feet of the president, it lands at Hillary Clinton as well," Romney said.

Mitt Romney, the Republican presidential nominee in 2012, threw a little cold water Sunday on the brewing speculation that he will mount a third White House bid in 2016.

"I'm not running, I'm not planning on running," Mr. Romney said in an interview on "Fox News Sunday," in response to a question about his future ambitions.

Mr. Romney's name continues to surface in speculation about which candidates will throw their hat in the ring in 2016 for the Republican presidential nomination. Some polls show him leading the potential field.

Top donors are searching for a polished pick with the stature to run against former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, the odds-on favorite in the prospective Democratic field. Many of these Republicans view Mr. Romney as something of a fallback choice, if former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush opts not to run.

In his Sunday appearance on Fox, Mr. Romney said there was "no question" in his mind that he would make a better president than Mrs. Clinton — or the person who beat him in 2012, President Barack Obama.

The 2012 Republican nominee also sought to cast doubts about Mrs. Clinton's foreign-policy bona fides, linking the potential candidate to Mr. Obama, whose support is sagging in most public-opinion polls, particularly for his handling for foreign policy.

In his appearance Sunday, Mr. Romney didn't entirely rule out a bid, but he didn't leave the door open very wide either.

"My time has come and gone," he said. "I had the opportunity. I ran and didn't win."

Politico: "Luis Gutiérrez: Martin O'Malley 'champion' of immigration"

By Maggie Haberman

September 6, 2014, 4:37 p.m. EDT

Rep. Luis Gutiérrez (D-Ill.), the loudest congressional voice on immigration reform and critic of the White House over deportations, on Saturday held up likely 2016 Democratic presidential hopeful Martin O'Malley as a reliable ally and champion on the issue.

Speaking at a campaign rally for Sen. Dick Durbin (D-Ill), Gutiérrez referenced Obama's decision to delay executive action on immigration, which was revealed just a few hours earlier.

Describing Durbin as a "champion" of Hispanics at the rally in Chicago for the Senator's re-election campaign, Gutiérrez added, "There's another wonderful, wonderful champion of our community, and he's with us. And I have the distinct honor and pleasure of introducing him. It's Governor O'Malley."

O'Malley, the governor of Maryland, recently criticized the White House for deportations of children who've illegally crossed the border escaping violence in their own countries, saying they would meet “certain death.”

“He wasn’t afraid to challenge the president to implement a more humane approach to the refugee crisis,” said Gutiérrez, who has said he would support Hillary Clinton if she runs for president.

“He doesn’t just talk, he walks the walk. His state of Maryland has cared for more unaccompanied children per capita than any other state in the United States of America.”

He also singled out O’Malley’s work on drivers licenses for immigrants and the state version of the DREAM Act, which has stalled in Congress. An O’Malley aide provided audio of the event.

Gutiérrez is a crucial validator with Hispanic voters, a fast-growing voting bloc and a critical one in a national campaign.

ThinkProgress: “Rand Paul Decides To Pick A Fight With Hillary Clinton Over Climate Change”

By Jeff Spross

September 7, 2014, 1:24 p.m. EDT

Sen. Rand Paul (R-KY) decided to pick a fight with Hillary Clinton over climate change on Friday.

The sticking point was a speech the former Secretary of State gave on Thursday to the National Clean Energy Summit in Las Vegas. Her remarks covered a wide range of issues, in particular foreign policy. But she also zeroed in on the need for the U.S. to tackle climate change, calling it “the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges we face.”

That was the part Paul pounced on. “For her to be out there saying that the biggest threat to our safety and to our well-being is climate change, I think, goes to the heart of the matter or whether or not she has the wisdom to lead the country, which I think it’s obvious that she doesn’t,” Paul said in a Friday appearance on Fox News, while discussing ISIS — the Islamic terrorist that’s seized territory in parts of Iraq and Syria.

“I don’t think we really want a commander-in-chief who’s battling climate change instead of terrorism,” Paul continued.

Hillary Clinton is widely considered the Democrats’ main contender for the presidency in 2016, while Paul is one of several Republican front-runners. In particular, the Kentucky Senator has distinguished himself as a voice of skepticism regarding American military intervention abroad, a position that has both won him accolades and put him in the uncomfortable position of embodying one side in a growing rift within the GOP over foreign policy.

That side also appears to be losing, as polling of Republicans across the country suggests a convergence is happening in favor of foreign policy hawkishness . Recently, Paul himself has taken the rise of ISIS as an opportunity to push back at his reputation as an isolationist.

The trouble for Paul is that, by all accounts, Clinton’s characterization of climate change is perfectly sound. Multiple environmental groups — including the League of Conservation Voters and NextGen Climate — shot back at Paul, many of them pointing out that the Defense Department’s own Quadrennial Defense Review in 2014 pointed to climate change as a “significant challenge for the United States.”

“The pressures caused by climate change will influence resource competition while placing additional burdens on economies, societies, and governance institutions around the world," the report explained. "These effects are threat multipliers that will aggravate stressors abroad such as poverty, environmental degradation, political instability, and social tensions — conditions that can enable terrorist activity and other forms of violence."

A 2014 study by a panel of 16 retired three- and four-star American generals and admirals also looked into the national security threats posed by climate change and concluded it is "a catalyst for conflict." And Rebecca Leber noted in The New Republic that the Pentagon's deputy assistant secretary of Defense for strategy and force development even explained the situation to the Senate panel Paul himself sits on.

"The effects of the changing climate affect the full range of Department activities, including plans, operations, training, infrastructure, acquisition, and longer-term investments," Daniel Chiu told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in July. "By taking a proactive, flexible approach to assessment, analysis, and adaptation, the Department can keep pace with the impacts of changing climate patterns, minimize effects on the Department, and continue to protect our national security interests."

Beyond national security threats, the threats posed by climate change to Americans' well-being and economic security are also striking. A recent national report entitled "Risky Business" — arguably the most comprehensive analysis done yet on the economic risks of climate change — noted that by 2100 there is a one-in-twenty chance climate change will reduce national labor productivity by three percent. "A decline of three percent in labor productivity nationally is like losing all of Connecticut's labor force," Kate Gordon, the study's executive director, told ThinkProgress. A big part of that reduction would come from heat: within the same time frame, the eastern half of the country could begin seeing a few days a year where heat and humidity combine to such a degree that it literally becomes life-threatening for people to be outside for an extended period.

The latest National Climate Assessment, meanwhile, projects rising heat waves, more droughts, more floods, and even more insidious effects like ocean acidification for every region of the U.S. — all of which in turn threaten the stability of industries and infrastructure around the country. If current projections for sea level rise pan out, it could wipe much of South Florida, including the city of Miami, right off the map by 2100.

In short, if climate change is not "the most consequential" challenge facing America, it's hard to imagine what issue could possibly qualify. And polling also indicates most Americans are aware of the problem, with majorities of voters consistently labeling climate change a serious threat and saying government should move decisively to deal with it.

That stance is not uniformly distributed, however: Democrats, along with Latinos, and other minorities, tend to register the most concern with global warming. But Republicans and Tea Party voters tend to be the most skeptical. They'll also be the voters Rand Paul will need to court in 2016.

NOTE FROM CTR RESEARCH, FACTS: Secretary Clinton engaged domestic and foreign leaders to secure and extract Americans from Benghazi. Secretary Clinton was fully engaged in locating and extracting Americans from Benghazi that night. As detailed in her book Hard Choices, Clinton spent the night coordinating rescue efforts with the White House, the National Security Council, the American Embassy in Tripoli, and Libyan President Mohamed Magariaf. Additional accounts of that night note that Secretary Clinton coordinated efforts with foreign leaders in Egypt, Yemen and Tunisia.

Boston Herald column: Adriana Cohen: "Benghazi truth emerges"

By Adriana Cohen

September 7, 2014

Three CIA military contractors who were in the fight for their lives when our consulate in Benghazi was attacked on Sept. 11, 2012, gave a riveting first-hand account in a bombshell interview with Fox News anchor Bret Baier of what really happened that night.

U.S. Ambassador to Libya Chris Stevens and three other Americans — including Winchester native Glen Doherty — lost their lives in the brutal attack by Islamist terrorists who launched RPGs, mortars and heavy fire into both the consulate and nearby annex — for 13 hours — while the White House and State Department ignored their cries for help.

When our consulate was attacked, these three CIA first responders wanted to immediately rush over to the compound to rescue Stevens and other personnel but say they were repeatedly told to wait and "stand down" for nearly 30 minutes by their CIA base chief, who was with them that deadly night. Their team leader was a CIA official who got direct orders from Washington to wait multiple times.

This long delay cost Ambassador Stevens and Sean Smith their lives.

Baier's report is based on a book coming out Tuesday, "13 Hours: The Inside Account of What Really Happened in Benghazi," written by Boston University journalism professor Mitchell Zuckoff along with the CIA contractors.

BAIER: If I gave you that 30 minutes back, would Ambassador Stevens and Sean Smith be alive today?

KRIS PARONTO (CIA contractor): Yes, they would still be alive.

BAIER: You in on that?

JOHN TIEGEN (CIA contractor): I strongly believe if we would have left immediately, they would still be alive today.

Not only did the delay cost two Americans their lives, but these three CIA security contractors and two others, Tyrone Woods and Doherty, were still fighting for their own lives as the attack continued. They requested air support and military back-up from the State Department — but Hillary Clinton didn't answer that 3 a.m. phone call. No help came. And good American men lost their lives because of it.

The Obama Administration — of course — denies they told anybody at the CIA annex to "stand down." It's no surprise they've been playing word games on what "language" they used to order the CIA security team to wait. Former President Bill Clinton — when caught in a sex scandal which led to his impeachment — spliced words during the investigation saying, "It depends what the meaning of 'is' is." With an ongoing congressional Benghazi investigation and upcoming midterm elections, the White House and their spokesmen are doing the same.

And America's not buying it. They know a cover-up when they see one.

Prior to the Sept. 11 attack, Obama was selling the phony narrative that terrorism was "on the run." So instead of admitting he was wrong when Islamist terrorists attacked our consulate, his administration made up the phony story that protesters upset by a video attacked our consulate and murdered these brave Americans. And then they went into cover-up mode. They put politics first and violated the "leave no man behind" military code.

And with a complicit mainstream media they got away with it, and Obama got re-elected. Politics and personal career ambitions should never trump human life. But in the Obama/Clinton regime, it does.

My heart goes out to the victims' families.

Jake,
Yes, I agree. We should also reassure our allies this Agreement is not the beginning of an Iran-American partnership in the region, but quite the contrary a Clinton presidency will be especially alert not only to violations of the Agreement, but will combat Iranian efforts to destabilize the region, support terrorist groups, and threaten the interests of the US and our allies.

Stu - thanks. We will have the stuff on partners and regional strategy. On options we use the hackneyed phrase but add, including if necessary our military options. I think that is stronger than the sentence you suggest, no?

There should also be the kind of statement I have suggested of working closely with our allies in the region, especially Israel, to counter Iranian terrorist activity, and to be certain they have the means to fully defend themselves against Iran.

Dear Friends:

Israel Policy Forum will soon provide conference calls, Insider Briefs, and in-person briefings with American and Israeli perspectives regarding the Iran nuclear deal announced this morning .

I know your inboxes are already inundated with reactions. In this email, I am providing a Roundup of excerpts of analysis / reactions that you can skim / review as you wish.

While continuing to provide resources, IPF will remain focused on our core mission and the implications for regional security and diplomacy going forward. And, we will continue to call for close US-Israel cooperation , befitting strategic allies.

Clearly, such dialogue is essential to create the kind of assurances that undoubtedly will be needed to advance regional security in the wake of today's announcement.

Best -

David

Nicholas Burns, to the NY Times :

> "The reality is that it is a painful agreement to make, but also necessary and wise," said R. Nicholas Burns, who drafted the first sanctions against Iran, passed in the United Nations Security Council in 2006 and 2007, when he was undersecretary of state for policy. "And we might think of it as just the end of the beginning of a long struggle to contain Iran. There will be other dramas ahead."

Jeffrey Goldberg, Atlantic Columnist :

> "The Iran drama is only beginning. Assuming that Obama can sell this deal to Congress—Chuck Schumer, a nation turns its lonely eyes to you—this will be a multi-year story of implementation. I wish I could believe what Obama seems to suspect, that this deal will set in motion a virtuous cycle in which moderates (relative moderates, of course) gain power in a liberalizing Iran. But I don't think that this is happening soon. For now, I hope that Obama will study the reality of Iranian activity in the region, and begin to push back against Iran's ambitions with more alacrity than he has done so far.

White House Talking Points / Graphics and Resources Page (includes video of President Obama's address):

> After many months of principled diplomacy, the P5+1 -- the United States, the United Kingdom, France, China, Russia and Germany -- along with the European Union, have achieved a long-term comprehensive nuclear deal with Iran that will verifiably prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon and ensure that Iran's nuclear program will be exclusively peaceful going forward.
> This deal stands on the foundation of the Joint Plan of Action (JPOA), achieved in November of 2013, and the framework for this Joint Comprehensive Plan of Action (JCPOA), announced in Lausanne on April 2, 2015 that set the requirements for the deal with the P5+ 1 and Iran, alongside the European Union announced today.
> Now, with this deal in place, the U.S., our allies, and the international community can know that tough, new requirements will keep Iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon. Here's how:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

AIPAC Statement :

"During these negotiations, we outlined five critical requirements for a good deal. We are deeply concerned based on initial reports that this proposed agreement may not meet these requirements, and thereby would fail to block Iran's path to a nuclear weapon and would further entrench and empower the leading state sponsor of terror."

Ilan Goldenberg, via Times of Israel :

As the fight over the Iran deal gets political, Democrats will be less inclined to oppose the president, explained Goldenberg, a former senior staffer on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee covering Middle East issues. "The more the question becomes — 'Do you trust Obama or do you support Netanyahu and the Republicans?' — the less likely the Democrats are to vote against the deal."

Rather than confrontation, the Israeli prime minister should seek to make amends with the administration and start a serious dialogue about what Washington and Jerusalem can do together to counter Iran's aggressive actions in the region and to ensure Tehran does not violate the nuclear agreement, Goldenberg suggested.

"The biggest strategic mistake Netanyahu can make is to walk away for the next 18 months and wait for next president," he said. "I don't think Israel can afford that. If he does that, he's only going to further widen the partisanship and turn Israel into a political wedge issue."

Instead of hoping for Congress to shoot down the deal, Netanyahu should encourage it to pass legislation that would support the agreement's vigorous implementation, Goldenberg continued. The Hill has several tools at its disposal: mechanisms to ensure sanctions snap back automatically if Iran violates the deal, more money for international inspectors, the creation of a permanent board with a congressional mandate to oversee the arms control agreement, and so on.

Rep. Steve Israel via website :

"I was skeptical at the beginning of this process, and I remain skeptical of the Iranians. In the fall, there will be a vote on this deal, and my obligation is to review every word, sentence, and paragraph of the deal to ensure it satisfies my continued concerns. Until then, you can continue to count me in the 'skeptical' column.

Ian Bremmer, President, Eurasia Group, via facebook :

The Iran deal is done. It's a historic moment. But as important as it is to defang Iran's nuclear threat, the bigger story is what the deal means for Iran's new standing in a crumbling geopolitical order. Three changes will matter most.

First, the competition between Shia Iran and Sunni Saudi Arabia will heat up, and the balance of power will tip toward Tehran. Saudi Arabia is now pumping the most oil since 1980, but an unsanctioned Iran will cut into Saudi market share. Iran is the holder of the world's fourth-largest proven crude oil reserves and second-largest natural gas reserves, and will soon bring 1 million barrels a day back to the market. Meanwhile, proxy fights in Iraq, Yemen, Syria, and elsewhere will intensify. As the U.S. and Europe look to reduce their presence in the region, the escalation of proxy wars between Saudi Arabia and Iran will heighten the risk of direct conflict.

Next, Iran will open for business. The world will trade again with Iran's $420 billion economy. Trade with the EU could expand as much as 400 percent, from $8.3 billion last year. Economic benefits will spill across the Gulf. Dubai will become a launch pad for foreign investment in Iran. And the investors are coming. Iran is not just another Middle Eastern petro-state; it offers investors a diversified economy with an established capital market. Its population of 80 million, the second largest in the Middle East, promises consumer demand across sectors as varied as travel and logistics to pharmaceuticals and consumer products. By some estimates, the nuclear deal could accelerate growth in Iran to 8 percent over the next three years and motivate the potential return of hundreds of thousands of highly talented Iranians.

Finally, Iran will lead the fight against ISIS. Obama is in no position to put U.S. boots on the ground, but the more battles ISIS wins in the Middle East, the more of a problem it will become internationally. Washington needs someone with the will and resources to deal ISIS a strong blow. And that's Iran. Though economic sanctions and a global arms embargo have limited the sophistication of Iran's military powers (Iran spends a fifth as much as Saudi Arabia on boosting its military assets), the expansion of Iranian influence and economic capabilities will pave the way for greater defense leadership in the Middle East. Iraqi Shia militias, backed by Iran, will offer a desperately-needed counter to ISIS.

Will Iran cheat on the deal? Yes. The U.S. and Iran aren't about to start trusting one other, much less become fast friends. But in the world created by the deal, Iran starts to matter much more than Saudi Arabia and other old-guard U.S. allies.

Today's deal isn't the end of the story. It's only the end of the first chapter.

Ehud Ya'ari, top Arab Affairs Analysts, on Channel 2 news:

"It's not as bad as we thought."

Jane Eisner, editor in chief, Forward :

"The vexing problem for American Jews is that consideration of this deal has become so intertwined with support for Israel that it may be impossible to arrive at an unbiased judgment."

Hillary Clinton, in private meeting with House Democrats

The deal is an "important step in putting a lid on Iran's nuclear program."

MK Isaac Herzog, as reported by the Jerusalem Post:

Herzog will be travelling to the US to "demand a dramatic package of security measures for Israel." ... "In regards to security I am more extreme than Netanyahu."

Tzipi Livni on Iran deal:

"dangerous and destructive"

Benjamin Netanyahu on Iran deal :

"Stunning, historic mistake."

Naftali Bennett, via twitter :

On July 14th, 2015 a terror nuclear superpower is born. Israel will defend itself.

Sen. Joe Lieberman via House Foreign Affairs Committee :

"There is much more risk for America and reward for Iran than there should be in the agreement... This is a bad deal for America, a bad deal for Iran's neighbors in the Middle East and a bad deal for the world."

Dennis Ross via Washington Post :

"Opponents need to explain what happens if the rest of the world accepts this deal, Iran says it is ready to implement it — and Congress blocks it. Will the European Union, which explicitly commits in the agreement to lift sanctions once Iran has fulfilled its main nuclear responsibilities, not do so because Congress says no? Can sanctions really be sustained in these circumstances, particularly if the Iranians don't increase their enrichment and say they will observe the deal? Could we be faced with a world in which the sanctions regime collapses, Iran gets its windfall and is only two months from breakout, and there is little on-ground visibility into its program? Maybe the answer is no, but the skeptics need to explain what we can do to ensure that this is not the outcome."

Aaron David Miller oped- in Wall Street Journal :

"Whether you're about to break open the champagne or don sack cloth over the U.S.-Iran nuclear deal , you may have questions about the agreement. Here are five things to look out for in the coming days, as we all assess the text of the agreement and reactions to it.:"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Abe Foxman, via ADL Statement :

"We are deeply disappointed by the terms of the final deal with Iran announced today which seem to fall far short of the President's objective of preventing Iran from becoming a nuclear weapon state. The thrust of the deal relies substantially on Iran's good faith and the ability of the IAEA to effectively carry out its inspection obligations."

Sen. Chuck Schumer statement :

"Supporting or opposing this agreement is not a decision to be made lightly, and I plan to carefully study the agreement before making an informed decision."

What's on ALEC's Agenda for its 40th Anniversary Meeting in Chicago?

by Brendan Fischer — August 7, 2013 - 10:34am

Share this

CHICAGO -- This week, the corporate and legislator members of the American Legislative Exchange Council are meeting at the swank Palmer House hotel in Chicago to celebrate the organization's 40th anniversary, be educated in corporate sponsored workshops and adopt legislative priorities for the coming year. Here is what is on the agenda for ALEC's 40th -- note that some of the workshops carry a $40,000 pricetag for corporate sponsors.

Fracking, Virtual Schools, and Privatization

- New ways to thwart local democratic control by prohibiting city or county governments from regulating genetically modified plant seeds. Members of the Agriculture Subcommittee -- which is chaired by Jeff Case of CropLife America -- will consider a bill to thwart local democratic control by prohibiting city or local governments from regulating genetically modified plant seeds, which happens to benefit many members of CropLife's trade association and other big ag companies. Contrary to the principle of local control, for years, ALEC has promoted bills to preempt local efforts to establish everything from paid sick days to municipal broadband.

- Presentations on how fracking America can lead to increased profits through exporting natural gas. American Petroleum Institute representatives Jon Shore and Rebecca Heimlich will give a presentation on "Local Bans on Hydraulic Fracturing: Coming Soon to Your District." And Jason French of energy company Cheniere Energy will present to the Energy Subcommittee about "LNG [Liquid Natural Gas] exports: A Story of American Innovation and Economic Opportunity."

- Discussions of wonders of nuclear energy and offshore drilling. Other energy-related agenda items include a presentation on "Nuclear Energy's Continuing Role in Providing Baseload Electricity," and another on "Developing America's Offshore Energy Potential: Good Sense and Good Cents." ALEC will also consider a "Resolution in Opposition to a Carbon Tax."

- More climate change denial? Members of the Energy, Environment, and Agriculture Task Force will be part of a breakfast plenary session called "A Thoughtful Approach to Climate Science." The title is less inflammatory than some of its past panels -- at the 2011 ALEC meeting, legislators attended a workshop titled "Warming Up to Climate Change: The Many Benefits of Increased Atmospheric CO2" -- but given ALEC funders like the Koch brothers and members like the Heartland Institute, it seems unlikely that the organization has woken up to the dangers of climate change.

Discussions about blocking GMO labeling laws and ordinances that would allow consumers to know if they are buying genetically engineered food, one of the goals of agribusiness and chemical firms that bankroll ALEC.

- Redoubled efforts to undermine renewable energy initiatives and maintain reliance on coal and other fossil fuels. One workshop, which cost $40,000 to sponsor, is titled "The Economic Benefits and Political Challenges to Coal Exports." Also on the docket is another bill to repeal renewable energy standards, the "Market Power Renewables Act," after the failure of the ALEC "Electricity Freedom Act" in 2013. As explained by the Checks and Balances Project:

  "'The Market-Power Renewables Act' will likely serve as the model for another round of attacks on state Renewable Portfolio Standards (RPS) in 2014 following ALEC's failure to weaken or eliminate clean energy policies this year. The new bill would significantly weaken state clean energy laws by broadening the eligible electricity sources to include existing, large hydroelectric power plants, biomass, biogas and other sources of electricity."

- Updates to some of ALEC's long-standing anti-union policies. The "Employee Secret Ballot Protection Act" will be amended "to call for [union certification by] a majority of members in the bargaining unit, rather than a majority of those voting." This was the same certification policy pushed by Scott Walker in Wisconsin, and creates an almost insurmountable burden: few governors or presidents would ever win election if they had to win a majority of all eligible voters, rather than just a majority of those who vote.

- Renewing objections to linking the minimum wage to the consumer price index. ALEC plans to brush-off and renew its "Resolution Opposing Increases in Minimum Wage Linked to CPI." In an apparent recognition that their justifications for opposing minimum wage increases are disintegrating, they will eliminate this line: "In reality, of the approximately 2.7% of U.S. workers that earn the minimum wage, two-thirds (2/3) will earn an increased wage in a year."

- Privatization and outsourcing of toll roads. Members of the Transportation Subcommittee will discuss "ALEC Principles on Toll Roads," which backs privatization of toll rolls, is particularly relevant to ALEC members Cintra, McQueary and Transurban (all foreign firms); Cintra and Macquarie have teamed up to cut multi-billion dollar contract deals to take control of highways in places like Illinois, basically granting companies a monopoly to help state government raise quick revenue in the short term, but in the long-term saddling consumers with higher fees and the state with lost revenue.

- New efforts to eliminate occupational licensing for any profession, which help guarantee that people who want to call themselves doctors, long-haul truckers, accountants, or barbers meet basic standards of training and expertise to guarantee that consumers are safe and get what they pay for.

- Expanding virtual "schools," which enriches ALEC's online school corporate funders, such as K12 Inc. The Illinois Policy Institute -- the State Policy Network affiliate in the state -- will present on "digital education." IPI employees had pushed a Virtual Charter School plan in Illinois, apparently in collaboration with ALEC member K12 Inc., the nation's largest provider of online charter schools (which has become notorious for poor educational outcomes and high profit margins). Additionally, at least two "workshops" -- which carry a $40,000 pricetag -- will deal with online education: "Modeling State Funding Formulas, K-12 Online Course Providers" and "Statewide Full-Time Virtual Schools: The Case for Parent Choice vs. Local Control."

- More flawed testing for colleges. ALEC has long promoted increased reliance on high-stakes testing for elementary and high school students, which many educators say has altered the classroom dynamic and interfered with teaching. A bill to be considered at the Chicago meeting will graduate that same testing regime to the college level with "The Collegiate Learning Assessment Bill."

Like a Good Neighbor, State Farm is There (With Bounty Hunters)

In the past year, at least 49 global corporations have dropped their ALEC membership, apparently recognizing that they don't want their brands publicly associated with an organization that pushes anti-union legislation and discriminatory voting laws.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But one of the most surprising hangers-on has been State Farm, an insurance company that has crafted an image as a "good neighbor:" it certainly doesn't seem like neighborly to bankroll an organization that has promoted "Stand Your Ground" laws that make it easier for self-appointed neighborhood watch vigilantes to get away with murder.

State Farm has not only stuck with ALEC, but retained a leadership role in the organization, with a State Farm representative acting as the co-chair for ALEC's Commerce, Insurance, and Economic Development Task Force -- the source of anti-labor bills and other controversial legislation.

Joining State Farm on that task force is the bail bond industry. Last year, ALEC disbanded the controversial Public Safety and Elections Task Force that had been responsible for bills like Stand Your Ground, Voter ID, and prison privatization, but the for-profit bail industry didn't jump ship: the American Bail Coalition President and CEO Bill Carmichael remains on the ALEC corporate board (now called the "Private Enterprise Advisory Council"), and the Surety Insurance Subcommittee -- chaired by the American Bail Coalition's Dennis Bartlett -- is now part of the State Farm's Commerce, Insurance, and Economic Development Task Force.

ABC, the for-profit bail bond industry's national organization and lobbying wing, has long been involved with ALEC, calling it the industry's "life preserver."

Raising the question, do bounty hunters make for good neighbors?

Hillary Clinton says even if we broke up every big bank America your paycheck won't go up one dime. Clinton says we need to break down all barriers to opportunity, fairness and justice that still hold too many Americans back every day. She says racism, sexism, other forms of discrimination deny people promotions they've earned, the fair pay they deserve or jobs they're qualified for. . And corporations rake in record profits and keep incomes stagnant while Americans work harder and longer. Subject: Re: Agenda for 5:30 Post NH Messaging Call - TESTING SUGGESTIONS

Jim Andrews and I have been pouring through the oppo and have a couple new possible negatives to suggest we test in the poll, since most of our attacks haven't been working. We also proposed language for a split message test between where we've been (ideas that sound good on paper/can't wait) versus the new no barriers message -- stacked up against Sanders

Hope these are helpful.

YOU PAY FOR SOCIALISM

Bernie Sanders says he wants to restructure America's economy to make it work like it does in the socialist countries of Europe, providing things like free health care for everyone, free college for everyone, and free increases in Social Security for everyone. But Sanders does not mention that the middle class picks up the bill in these countries, paying nearly sixty percent of their income in taxes, three times what middle class Americans pay now.

FREE STUFF FOR EVERYBODY

Bernie Sanders said –quote– "all necessities of life must be provided free for people," and over the years he's proposed a radical restructuring of the entire American economy to make many things free, from the gas for people's cars to telephones and now free college and health care. To do this, Sanders proposed the complete government takeover of all oil companies, gas companies, electric utility companies, phone companies, health care companies, and all television networks. Combined, Sanders proposals would put the government in control of more than half of the American economy, but Sanders has never told anyone who would pay for all of this or how it would work.

SPEND, TAX AND COVER IT UP

Bernie Sanders' spending plans cost at least eighteen trillion dollars, would increase government spending by 50% and equal the size of the current national debt. And it's actually worse. Experts say Sanders health care plan alone is quote –twice as expensive as he says it is and they say Sanders plans would increase middle class taxes by one third, even for people making less than nineteen thousand a year, and Sanders plans would raise the top tax rate to seventy seven percent. The Boston Globe said –quote "Sanders is not leveling with voters" about the real cost of his spending plans.

EXTREME ON NATIONAL SECURITY

Bernie Sanders' extreme views would gut America's national security and make less safe. Sanders ran for Congress calling for the military budget to be cut by more than half and spending the money on a "major electrified rail system" instead. In Washington, Sanders sponsored a law to unilaterally terminate America's entire nuclear weapons program and sponsored another law to cut the nuclear submarine fleet in half. In Congress, Sanders proposed massive cuts in the intelligence budget and earlier said we should shut down the entire CIA because –quote they "might even be able to overthrow the U.S. government if they chose to." Sanders is so ideologically committed to military cuts that just last year he said –quote we shouldn't spend money on the military "even if it does create jobs."

TROUBLING PATTERN ON CAMPAIGNING

Bernie Sanders says he's running a different kind of campaign, but the record tells another story. Last year a Sanders affiliated political action committee was fined by the federal election commission and Sanders staffers were caught hacking into computers and stealing data on political opponents. This year, Sanders got caught running ads that said he was endorsed by newspapers that actually endorsed his opponent and was forced to remove ads from the air. Sanders got caught claiming endorsements from organizations that endorsed his opponent and the American Legion is now threatening to sue him for falsely claiming he has their support.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

TROUBLING PATTERN ON WOMEN

Bernie Sanders says he supports women's rights, but has a pattern of expressing and tolerating extreme views on women. Sanders once wrote that men fantasize about women being on their knees and women fantasize about being raped by three men simultaneously. Sanders wrote another article that connecting women's sexual behavior to breast cancer and said the way parents teach their daughter about sex –quote– "very well determine whether or not she will develop breast cancer." Now Sanders' supporters are flooding the internet with troubling comments about women quote –voting with their vaginas– and calling women who support Hillary Clinton quote –bitches.

BERNIE VS HRC MESSAGE TEST

BERNIE

Bernie Sanders says we have a corporate establishment whose greed is destroying the economy and a corrupt political establishment beholden to billionaires. Sanders says the billionaire class can't get huge tax breaks and hide profits overseas while the middle class is being hollowed out. Sanders says corporate America and the billionaire class have to start paying their fair share, and that to change things we need a political revolution to undo the power of corporate America and Wall Street. You sure can't change a corrupt system by taking its money. Sanders says one person alone can't change this country, but we can do it together.

HRC: BARRIERS

Hillary Clinton says we need to break down barriers of social injustice. Clinton says racism and sexism and other forms discrimination are not simply an effect of economic inequality, but are also part of the cause of economic inequality. Clinton says she will hold Wall Street accountable, but Wall Street is not gunning down young African Americans or denying immigrants a path to citizenship. Clinton says we can't move forward when women make seventy eight cents for each dollar men make, when people can be fired just because they're gay or when African American men go to prison at the same rate they graduate college. Clinton says that America can't reach its full potential when you're held back from reaching yours.

HRC CAN'T WAIT

Hillary Clinton says she is not interested in ideas that sound good on paper but will never make it the real world, and she won't make promises she can't keep. Clinton says the single mom who needs raise can't wait for plans that will never happen. The student with a mountain of debt can't wait. The grandmother who has to choose between paying for medicine and paying the rent can't wait. Clinton says she's spent a lifetime making a difference for people and getting results, from winning benefits for the National Guard and Reserve to winning health care for eight million children and she's ready to roll up her sleeves and get to work right now. Clinton says she's ready to tackle our toughest challenges and move our country forward.

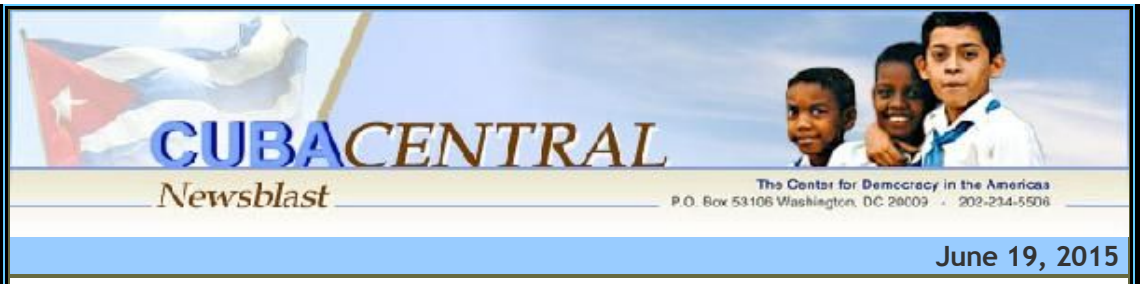
Subject: The Cuban Military Not So Transparent Act

Having trouble viewing this message? Click Here



June 19, 2015

Dear Friends,

Legislation introduced earlier this month by Senator Marco Rubio (FL) - the Cuban Military Transparency Act - isn't transparent at all.

Rather than revealing something about Cuba's military, the legislation conceals the intent of its authors; namely, to shame, harass, and try to stop every American from visiting Cuba or seeking to do business in Cuba, and to return U.S. policy to its pre-December 17, 2014 goal of starving the Cuban economy and the Cuban people along with it.

Why are the seven Senate sponsors relying now on such desperate measures? A few numbers - 43, 36, and 620,000 - tell the story.

- We can now count forty-three Republican and Democratic Senators who've stepped forward to sponsor The Freedom to Travel to Cuba Act, legislation to make it legal for all Americans to travel to Cuba. We congratulate Senators Barbara Mikulski (MD), Patty Murray (WA), and Pat Roberts (KS), the chairman of the Agriculture Committee, for being the most recent among them.
- President Obama's decision to streamline regulations on purposeful travel to Cuba has galvanized interest across the United States in visiting Cuba. From January 1 to May 9th in 2015, there has been a 36% increase by Americans to the island over the same period last year.
- For Cuban Americans who can visit Cuba on an unlimited basis, thanks to regulatory changes by President Obama, travel to the island is rising substantially. According to the Havana Consulting Group, family travel visits could 620,000 in 2015, a record.

This surge in visitors makes a huge difference for Cubans employed in transportation, lodging, restaurants, the owners of restaurants and beds and breakfasts, and the artisans and translators who get payments in hard currency or work in the "tip economy."

According to 14ymedio, the number of self-employed persons in Cuba exceeded 500,000 for the first time at the end of May 2015, with young people and women benefiting enormously. Studies show that travel and tourism are big drivers of employment and economic growth. As state-owned enterprises like hotels struggle to accommodate increases in tourism, the private sector will, as one analyst reported, fill capacity gaps, especially in the areas of lodging and restaurants, accelerating change in the structure of Cuba's economy.

The economic reforms under President Raúl Castro enable Cubans to work for businesses that profit from the increase in travel taking place under President Obama's policy reforms. Many Cubans are earning more money, and interacting and exchanging more with U.S. travelers. This is a virtuous circle producing better lives for Cubans in ways that simply couldn't happen under 50 years of isolation and sanctions.

Most of us look at this emerging picture and think, "what's not to like?" In contrast, the Senate sponsors of the Cuban Military Transparency Act see the fifty years of diplomatic isolation and economic sanctions they've supported coming to an end. That is why they are acting so desperately.

So, what does their legislation really attempt to do? If enacted into law, it would prohibit a U.S. person from engaging in any financial transactions with Cuba's Ministry of Defense and Interior Ministry, senior officials employed by them, or entities they own or control.

It's not a secret that in Cuba, a socialist state with a largely state-owned economy, the military is invested in state-owned businesses, and several of those - as the Senate bill says - are dominant players in Cuba's tourist industry.

Given the military's broad role in Cuba's economy, any expenditure by U.S. travelers and businesses - including the cost of hotel rooms, telephone calls, airport taxes, the hotel occupancy tax, sales taxes on tourist purchases, resort fees - could be prohibited presumptively unless the traveler or company could persuade OFAC they spent their money in Cuba some other way.

How could they prove the negative? Who in Cuba will hand out the forms that say "that hotel room" or "that painting" or "that serving of ropa vieja" didn't come from an enterprise owned or controlled by Cuba's military? Of course, the sponsors aren't interested in compliance with their bill - they simply want to fill Americans with fear so that they don't pack their bags and go, doing incalculable damage on Cuban families and their prospects for the future.

And let's be clear: this legislation covers ETESCA , Cuba's telecommunications company. Should it become law, it would prohibit Google and Facebook from doing business in Cuba. Millions of Cubans waiting for better connections to the Internet could thank the 7 Senate "transparency act" sponsors for that result as well.

If there were a truth-in-naming rule in the U.S. Congress, they could have given this enormously damaging legislation a much more fitting title:

- The No-Freedom to Travel to Cuba Act;
- The Stop Cuban Americans From Visiting their Families in Cuba Act;
- The Smother Free Enterprise in Cuba Act; or even
- The Keep Google and Facebook from Connecting Cubans to the Internet Act

But no such rule in Congress exists, as is transparently the case.

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

U.S., Cuba ready to announce embassy openings in early July

Negotiations between the U.S. and Cuba to reopen embassies will wrap up in early July, Reuters reports. While in Cuba, U.S. Senator Jeff Flake (AZ) made headlines this week calling the opening of embassies "imminent."

Since Presidents Obama and Castro announced their bilateral breakthrough last December, Cuba and the United States have held four rounds of talks aimed at restoring diplomatic relations, opening embassies, and addressing the roles of rights of each country's diplomats. The fourth round was held last month in Washington and "made progress," according to press accounts , but failed to reach resolution on remaining issues.

Unresolved items are said to include freedom of movement by diplomats in the respective countries, the security and amount of shipments to the embassies, and disagreement over U.S. diplomats' activities that Cuba finds objectionable, including teaching of journalism classes and providing Internet access at the U.S. Interests Section in Havana. Reuters reports that these issues are expected to be resolved before the announcement in July.

An unmistakable symbol of the changing bilateral relationship could be seen in the front yard of Cuba's future embassy in Washington last week, when staff of the Cuban Interests Section installed a flagpole - awaiting the moment when they can hoist their nation's flag.

What we now call the U.S. Interests Section in Havana functioned as an embassy until January 3, 1961 when President Dwight Eisenhower severed diplomatic relations. President Carter, who had sought to normalize relations with Cuba, established the U.S. Interests Section in Havana (and agreed to the opening of a Cuban Interests Section in Washington); each of which have operated under the auspices of the Swiss Embassy since 1977.

raising at the future U.S. Embassy in Havana, but his recent bicycle injury, and ongoing negotiations over Iran's nuclear program, may have caused him to delay his trip to the island.

Republican Presidential Primary Pack Divides on Cuba

According to Lesley Clark, White House correspondent for McClatchy, Donald Trump told reporters during a campaign stop in New Hampshire on Wednesday that he supports the new direction in Cuba policy initiated late last year by President Obama.

Reporting on Twitter, Clark quotes Trump saying, "It's time, it's fine," and "I don't mind Cuba happening, but the U.S. could've struck a better deal."

Also this week, New Jersey Governor Chris Christie, speaking at a town hall meeting in New Hampshire, appeared to soften his opposition to President Obama's decision to expand travel rights for all Americans, according to a report filed for NJ Advance Media .

"If you're allowed to (travel to Cuba) everybody's got to make their own free choice," Christie said. "I'm just giving my opinion on it, which is I don't know why you would want to support that regime given the way they treat their own people.
"I couldn't do it," Christie added, but "Others will have to make their own choice."

This libertarian approach differs from Christie's earlier statements. In April, Governor Christie called Obama's policy a "national disgrace ." Last year, after the President announced the diplomatic breakthrough, he demanded that Cuba return Joanne Chesimard to the U.S. before "any further consideration of the restoration of diplomatic relations with the Cuban government."

By contrast, former Florida governor Jeb Bush, who announced his candidacy for president this week, was clear in opposing the new direction in policy. If elected in 2016, he promised never to visit Cuba until he could "go to Havana in solidarity with a free Cuban people."

Senator Rand Paul (KY), also a presidential aspirant, has dismissed supporters of the U.S. embargo as "isolationists."

Sprint, T-Mobile offer calling plans to Cuba (¿Puedes escucharme ahora?)*

Sprint and T-Mobile will offer calling plans to Cuba, CNET reports. Sprint will offer a "Cuba 20 Plus" plan, providing 20 minutes of calling to any Cuban number for $20 per month, plus 70 cents for additional minutes.

"With the recent government expansion of relations with Cuba, and Miami being an important market...we wanted to combine a promotion with a way to give back to Cuban-Americans and make it easier for them to call friends and family in Cuba," said Dow Draper, president of Sprint prepaid.

T-Mobile will offer a similar deal, with is prepaid arm MetroPCS, to offer 20 minutes of calls to Cuba plus unlimited calling and texts to 75 other countries for $10 per month.

Currently, a third party line is necessary to call Cuba from the United States. Companies like HablaCuba and DimeCuba offer services to call Cuba for 70 cents per minute.

*Apologies to Verizon .

Google, other tech companies head to Cuba to talk Internet connectivity

A Google executive is heading to Cuba this weekend to meet with government officials regarding Internet access in Cuba, Politico reports. Google has already made an undisclosed offer to Cuba's government on this subject, and Cuba has promised to increase Internet access universally by 2020.

Brett Perlmutter, the Google executive headed to Cuba, works for Google's Ideas unit which, according to its website , is "a team of engineers, researchers and geopolitical experts who build products to support free expression and access to information, especially in repressive societies." He will be joined by about a dozen U.S. business representatives to "focus on helping the Cuban government think through their publicly-stated goal of improving Internet access," a Google spokesperson said.

The trip was organized and facilitated by the New York-based Council of the Americas whose goal is promoting free trade, democracy and open markets throughout the Americas. "A lot of companies are very interested," said Alana Tummino, director of policy at Council of the Americas. "It's an intriguing market because it's a virgin one for growing IT and telecom infrastructure."

According to current estimates, about 5% of Cubans have Internet access, a figure that rises to a bit over 20% by including illegal dial up services in homes. This month, Cuba's government proposed an ambitious plan to increase Internet access incrementally, with the goal of reaching universal access by 2020. The plan involves the installation of Internet in more government offices and all schools before other sectors, but is unprecedented nonetheless. Cubans are eager to access the World Wide Web at reasonable costs, and the demand exists for the government to move further and faster.

U.S. universities beginning to recruit Cuban students

With the warming trend in U.S.-Cuba relations, U.S. universities are beginning to recruit Cuban students. The nonprofit organization Educational Testing Services is working to certify test centers in Cuba. This will soon enable Cubans to sit for entrance exams such as the GRE for graduate school and the TOEFL, an English proficiency test. Four Cuban students will take the TOEFL test later this month, and the GRE is expected to offered in October. Technology and, in some cases, limited computer stations, are proving to be hurdles, as well as arranging for new payment mechanisms (in lieu of standard online credit card payment).

Richard Blanco, Inaugural poet, visits Cuba, notes change

Richard Blanco, the Cuban American who delivered the Inaugural poem at President Obama's second inauguration, visited the island along with longtime friend Ruth Behar, the New York Times reports. The two just launched a popular bridge-building poetry project between the United States and Cuba that focuses on the cultural and personal side of the historic change.

Blanco hadn't been to the island since 2009, and was shocked by the changes he saw. "For a moment I forgot I was in Cuba. Everything had become so much easier to do," he said. He noted the high quality of restaurants and a play he and Ms. Behar attended during his trip.

Blanco and Behar also noted the pain of realizing most of their younger relatives had left for abroad, as many Cuban families are split up. Blanco said he "hoped families and the countries' two governments can work to develop new relationships that lead to a more sustainable Cuban system."

"How," he asked, "can you take the good from everything, put it all together and make it better?"

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

Cuban representatives will call for end of Puerto Rico's "colonial status" at UN

The official Cuban News Agency has reported that Cuban diplomats will call for "self-determination and independence" for the people of Puerto Rico on June 22. The draft resolution on the "colonial status of Puerto Rico" will be submitted to the Special Decolonization Committee of the United Nations.

According to the Cuban News Agency, "It calls on the U.S. government to assume its responsibility in this process so that Puerto Ricans enjoy their rights."

Currently, Puerto Rico belongs to the United States, but is not a part of the United States, and its political status has been debated for over half a decade.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This issue came before the U.N. sixty-two years ago. As the Latin Post reported, The United Nations General Assembly voted in 1953 to recognize the island's self-government and removed it from its list of non-self-governing territory[ies]."

State newspaper Granma noted that "Among the most significant elements to be presented ... will be that of demanding that the government of the United States assume the responsibility of embarking on a process that would allow the Puerto Rican people to fully exercise their inalienable right to self-determination, to independence and to decision-making in a sovereign manner."

IN CUBA

Cuba's government announces Wi-Fi expansions and cheaper Internet

US News reports that Cuba's government is expanding Internet access on the island by creating 35 new government computer centers in July. In addition, hourly use of Wi-Fi will halve in cost from $4.50 to $2 beginning on July 1. The lowered price is still 10% of the average Cuban's income, but the decrease will give Internet access to many who currently do not have it.

"The Internet space is opening up here and I think this is a significant step," said Norges Rodriguez, a blogger and telecommunications engineer in Havana. "A year or two ago, we didn't have anything like this."

The proposed connectivity changes, though miniscule in comparison to universal Internet access, will help to meet the demands among Cubans for greater Internet access in one of the world's least connected countries.

Cuba likely to end dual-currency system by the end of the year

The Financial Times reports that two years after Cuba's government announced it would work to end the dual currency system in Cuba, economists on the island predict the CUC will be taken out of circulation by the end of the year.

Cuba currently has two currencies -- the national money, Cuban pesos (CUP), is what government workers are paid in and what is used at state food markets. 24 CUPs amount to one U.S. dollar. The convertible Cuban peso (CUC) was introduced in 1994 as Cuba began to open its economy to tourism and more foreign ventures. The CUC is pegged to the U.S. dollar one-to-one.

"It is my understanding that the CUC will be removed from circulation before the next Communist Party Congress in April," said a Cuban economist with knowledge of reform efforts.

Restaurants and markets in Cuba that once only accepted CUCs began to accept CUPs this year, a harbinger for impending reforms. In addition, higher-valued CUP bills were introduced this year, ranging from 200 to 1,000 pesos.

The Financial Times reports that the move would "continue President Raúl Castro's efforts to introduce market elements and remove price distortions, and improve accounting transparency and the efficiency of state companies."

Could Cuba be Vietnam in the Caribbean? , Richard E. Feinberg, Financial Times

Richard Feinberg, Professor of International Political Economy at the University of California, San Diego, and non-resident Senior Fellow at the Brookings Institution, asks what Cuba could learn - and improve upon - from Vietnam's example.

"Cuba has the requisite resources - natural and human - and the location to create a balanced economy. It has fertile soil. Capable scientists have begun building a biotech cluster and the many computer engineers await opportunities that will come with global interconnectedness. The island could again become a shipping and logistics hub . And exotic Cuba could draw a variety of tourists, offering urban culture, eco-resorts, maritime sports, as well as traditional sun and surf.

"As it evolves into a more open and market-driven economy, Cuba can improve upon Vietnam's experience. Cubans can study Vietnam's mixed and diversified economy, while eschewing rampant corruption and offensive inequalities and conserving impressive social achievements."

Cuba after the Castros: the likely scenario , Jose Azel, The Wall Street Journal

Offering a more pessimistic take on Cuba after President Raúl Castro steps down in 2018, Jose Azel, a Senior Scholar at the Institute for Cuban and Cuban-American Studies, University of Miami offers his predictions in the Wall Street Journal. Spoiler alert: the military men will take ownership of the economy.

A witness to history, Cuban exile ready to visit the island , Mimi Whitefield, Naples Daily News

Jack Skelly, age 89, whose father ran the railroad in Cuba for the United Fruit Company, wants to return to visit Cuba for the first time in 56 years. He worked in Cuba as a journalist, fielded requests from President Eisenhower to help win the release of U.S. prisoners, and, because he could speak English, worked for a short-time as the International Press Coordinator and translator for Fidel Castro. But he soon became disillusioned with the Revolution and fled to the United States, where he supported John F. Kennedy's presidential campaign, and later helped with speeches dealing with Latin American affairs.

He welcomed President Obama's decision to seek normal relations with Cuba. "I thought it was about time. I was against the embargo; I thought there was no reason for it."

The Corban University men's baseball team traveled to Caimanera, Cuba to play an away game unlike any other this week. Corban University is a private Baptist university in Oregon. The team was met by a crowd of 1,500 Cuban fans and the game commenced against a local team. The crowd began chanting "USA. USA." after Corban's first run. The team was also involved with missionary work on the trip, and "has already been invited back."

U.S. children's choir aims to break down barriers with Cuba concert , Adam Justice, International Business Times

A Los Angeles children's choir has embarked on an 11-day tour of Cuba in an effort to increase U.S. engagement with the island through music. Director of the Young Men's Ensemble Steven Kronauer will be teaming up with local Cuban choir Cantoria Coralillo for a choir workshop before they take to the stage for a series of concerts. The group will perform their last concert in Havana on June 21.

Subject: [big campaign] McCain/Global Warming--Memo in Advance of Policy Speech

TO: Reporters Covering McCain/Global Warming
FR: Sierra Club, contact David Willett, National Press Secretary

RE: Upcoming Global Warming/Energy Policy Speeches

Over the coming days, Senator McCain is expected to unveil his plans for addressing global warming. While still awaiting details of the plan, the Sierra Club can offer some specific points on his record on the issue so far, as well as some red flags that would undermine any strong plan to be on the lookout for as details emerge.

While Senator McCain deserves credit for his work on early global warming legislation in the Senate and for bringing attention to the need for urgent action, his efforts to date have been driven by yesterday's solutions and they won't solve tomorrow's problems. The science on global warming has changed dramatically over the last five years and the bill Senator McCain has previously championed is outdated and fails to provide the big changes Americans are demanding. Like President Bush, McCain's policies on global warming offer more of the same, by putting the interests of polluters over the people and failing to invest in building a clean energy economy that will create new jobs and opportunities at a time when an economic boost is sorely needed. Americans want real change--investment in clean, renewable energy instead of Big Oil, Nuclear power and other polluting industries. We need more windmills not windfalls.

Any serious attempt to meet the challenge of global warming must include these basic principles:

First, the targets and timetables must be sufficient to do what the science demands in both the near and long terms to reduce the negative impacts of climate change to the maximum extent possible. This will require reductions in total emissions on the order of 80 percent by 2050 and 20 percent by 2020.

Next, permits to emit carbon must be used for public benefit, not private windfalls. Pollution allowances are a public trust. All allowances should be auctioned or otherwise used to benefit the public, not to generate windfall profits for polluting industries. Free allocations, if any, must be limited in size and restricted to a short transition period.

Revenue raised by the bill should be used to promote a clean energy future by investing in the highest-value solutions for emissions reductions first. These funds should not be used to perpetuate dirty, expensive, outdated technologies like coal and nuclear energy. Allowances and auction revenues should be used to accelerate deployment of the clean energy technologies we have today and to develop the ones we need for tomorrow. Funds should be invested only in the cleanest, cheapest, safest, and fastest means of reducing emissions.

Finally, the bill must ensure a just transition for workers, protect vulnerable groups, and help induce world action. Allowances and auction revenues should be used to protect low- and moderate-income citizens from rising energy costs and other negative economic impacts, create new jobs, ensure fair treatment for affected workers and their communities, and drive technology transfer to help achieve emissions reductions around the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We must also take care of communities that suffer the impacts of global warming we were too late to avoid.

Numerous studies have shown that we can achieve these goals and meet our energy needs with the cleanest energy sources and efficiency and without relying on dirty power. If Senator McCain wants to have a credible and feasible plan for addressing global warming, he must demonstrate a commitment to these principles and have a plan that adds up to what science tells us the world needs. Senator McCain should also join other Senators to end outrageous subsidies to polluters like Big Oil as they continue to rake in record profits. Unfortunately, even as Senator McCain urges America to shower the nuclear energy industry with billions in subsidies, he has criticized money for biofuels and failed to support incentives for clean renewable energy like wind and solar power.

Major "red flag" issues to look for in any infeasible global warming plan

* Support for drilling in the Arctic Refuge or lifting the 30-year moratorium on drilling on the Outer Continental Shelf
* Support for "unconventional fossil fuels"--liquid coal, tar sands, or oil shale development
* Any expansion of existing subsidies or support for the construction of new nuclear power plants--including loan guarantees
* Support for the Yucca Mountain facility
* Any attempt to classify coal or nuclear power as "renewable"
* Any global warming plan that gives away allowances to polluters for free without designated purpose
* Any global warming plan with a so-called "safety-valve" that would break the carbon cap
* Any global warming plan that bars US action until China, India, and others act
* Denial of state authority to regulate global warming emissions from vehicles
* Denial of state authority to regulate global warming pollution generally
* Refusal to subsidize the development of real clean energy technologies or the production of clean energy

Simply awesome - This perfectly counters the argument projected by the ridiculously reluctant Cold Warriors & those who have right-wing special interest contributions in their campaign coffers. It would be great to see this story pushed far & wide - and, of course, replicated repeatedly.

Please contact me off-list if you are able to project this story and/or would like to help place the next one.

Commentary: Lifting ban would make Cuba freer, open

By Bob Stallman

WASHINGTON — It amazes me that it is 2009 and Americans are still unable to visit or do business with Cuba. It is the only country in the world where our government bans Americans from traveling. Unfortunately, a lot of opportunities are being missed for both business and tourism because of these costly restrictions.

I was lucky enough to visit Cuba in 2002. I say lucky because both the country and its people are beautiful. It also helped me see firsthand the disarray left on Cuba's agriculture industry when the Russian troops left in the early 1990s and how Cubans are dealing with the aftermath.

My trip to Cuba shored up several things for me. First, Cuban citizens are good people and second, they need affordable food.

During my visit, it was striking to see tourists there from everywhere in the world except the United States. To remedy this, there is legislation on Capitol Hill that would open Cuba to travel for U.S. citizens. Further, President Obama recently relaxed rules to allow Cuban-Americans to visit their family, while easing financial and gift restrictions.

These actions bring us one step closer to increasing food and agricultural sales to Cuba, an important priority for the American Farm Bureau Federation. U.S. agricultural sales to Cuba have been on average $400 million annually since 2000. With the embargo lifted, we expect that number would rise to $1 billion annually.

While touring the Cuban countryside I realized the nation's ability to produce bulk commodities had significantly diminished after the Russians' departure. Other countries are taking advantage of the opportunity.

For example, I visited a joint venture project between an Israeli investor and the Cuban government to grow oranges. This is just one agriculture example and there are plenty more.

Being able to feed its citizens is a big priority for Cuba. It is a poor country, but its people are by no means malnourished. Every Cuban is given rations for basic foods, such as milk and rice. When I was there, a campaign was in place encouraging average citizens in cities to plant plots of vegetables in order to help produce food.

There are many practical reasons the United States and Cuba should be trading. The Cuban government allocates a specific sum of money to buy food and pay transportation costs for those imports. Transportation costs would be minimal between the United States and Cuba compared to Europe or Asia, which means more money could go toward feeding Cuba's citizens instead of being burned up in shipping costs.

By removing U.S. restrictions on Cuba, we also weaken the totalitarian grip on that nation's citizens. History has shown we can do more to spread democracy by opening travel and trade to other countries. By working as ambassadors of change in those countries we can have more positive impact on the lives of the Cuban people than anything we have done under this embargo over the last 47 years.

The definition of insanity is doing the same thing over and over again and expecting different results. After nearly a half century, the time is now to open Cuba's border to U.S. citizens, businesses and ideals.

Main Topics: Giuliani and Jindal's Interviews, Local McCain coverage

Summary of Shift: Jesse Jackson's comments on Barack Obama "talking down to black people" dominated today's news cycle. He appeared on all major networks to apologize for the negative comments. Iran launched more test missiles last night "as a message to Israel". Democrats, including Barack Obama, partnered with Republicans to pass the FISA bill yesterday. Senator Ted Kennedy returned to the senate to block the Republican filibuster of a Medicare bill and received a standing ovation. New DNA evidence has cleared the family of Jonbenet Ramsey of her murder. Wildfires still rage in California forcing the evacuation of large parts of Butte County.

Giuliani Attacks Obama for flip-flopping on Fox and Friends (FNC 07/10/08 07:15am)
RUDY GIULIANI: It is particularly difficult in the case of someone who's as inexperienced as Barack Obama. Because there's no other record to compare it to. If you had somebody who had 20, 30 years of executive experience, legislative Experience, you'd have a whole record of seeing when they do make a change, how much of a change do they make, what does it mean, is it an honest one, isn't it. Contrast that with John McCain who said in the primaries I'd rather lose and election than lose a war. We know where John McCain stands on Iraq.

STEVE DOOCY: Oh absolutely.

GIULIANI: We know where he stands on terrorism. We know he's going to make some changes too. Everybody does. But we know the core of the man. Which is a big difference.

[…]

ANDREW NAPOLITANO: […] Coming out in favor of faith based initiatives and voting for FISA be an effort to take those issues of the table in November. I mean if he voted against FISA, but aside the merits of it, McCain would be beating him over the head with that vote. By voting for it it's not an issue in the fall.

GIULIANI: That isn't an issue, but who is Barack Obama is an issue in the fall. What does he stand for? […]

Giuliani Talk About How McCain Can Best Win Election (MSNBC, 07/10/08, 8:15am)
PAT BUCHANAN: If you had one piece of advice you'd give John McCain to really pull this thing together and win this race, what would you tell him?

RUDY GIULIANI: I watched John win a republican primary that last year at this time, everybody thought he was going to lose. Including me, and probably you, except him. He was the one who didn't think he was going to lose. And how did John win that? He won it by being John McCain. By being himself. Sure John will make some changes on positions here and there. But the kind of changes that Barack Obama is making would be like John McCain changing his position on Iraq. You know, on a core position. Obama got elected because he was going to take, or got nominated because he was going to take the troops out of Iraq, he was going to be the left-wing candidate. Now he's changing that position. I would be John. […] Go do a lot of those town hall meetings. Don't try to be the scripted candidate. That isn't you. When he tried that at the beginning of the primary, he was losing. When he became John McCain in New Hampshire, he whipped all of us. And I think the American people want someone authentic. They want someone who's not going to go consult a poll, and they want a leader.

SCARBOROUGH: But talking about leadership though, his political organization has been in chaos for the past year. It's still in chaos. Who's in? Is Mike Murphy in? Is he going to be running the campaign? Is he going to be an advisor? Is he going to be on MSNBC? Is Steve Schmidt? […] That's what republicans worry about, because they're saying, wait a second, its July and this guy still hasn't figured out his campaign structure.

GIULIANI: He figured it out well enough to win a primary that nobody thought he was going to win. He's the candidate of the republican party. And the reality is, he has a small campaign staff. Not a very large one.

SCARBOROUGH: But Mr. Mayor, when he had the big infrastructure, he blew it. He lost all of his money, he fired his staff, and he started winning when he started flying in the middle seat of commercial aircraft.

GIULIANI: Well, that's because when John McCain, just became John McCain, started relating to people, he is an enormously impressive candidate. That's when he whipped all of us.

SCARBOROUGH: So when he's President of the United States, can we expect him flying in the middle seat? […] The bigger point is, when you run an organization you have to know how to run it!

GIULIANI: John McCain didn't want Secret Service protection. He still has, I think. He wants to be himself, he wants to continue to remain in contact with people. He's going to be an enormously effective president. He's a very effective senator. He's one of the most effective members of the United States Senate, in terms of getting things done, in comparison to Barack Obama who's accomplished nothing in the Senate.

WILLY GEIST: Mr. Mayor, we look at these polls everyday, these Gallup tracking polls. We saw a couple weeks ago that Barack Obama had double digit leads in certain polls, now we see it shrinking down and we say 80 percent of the country is dissatisfied with the way things are going. The President's approval rating is at 30 percent, something like this. It seems like things are stacked against John McCain, and yet he's right in a virtual tie by this poll you're looking at here, with Barack Obama. Why?

GIULIANI: Because it's about the two of them. It's not about President Bush, it's not about former President Clinton. It's not about Jesse Jackson. It's about the two of them, and it's going to become more and more about the two of them. And it's how the two of them impress the American people that will ultimately decide that. Not President Bush's approval ratings, or Jesse Jackson's comments. And John McCain's got a very strong personality, and my point is he's got to impose that on this campaign and he's going to win.

Jindal Touts McCain's Economic and Energy Plans, Agrees with Obama's support for FISA and Faith Based Initiatives (FNC 07/10/08 08:20am)

BOBBY JINDAL: when it comes to the economy, senator McCain is where the majority of Americans are. First he wants to cut our taxes, secondly cut government spending to balance the budget third lower energy prices, do more domestic conservation and alternative energy, and he doesn't want the government running our health care. […] Senator McCain understands we need more domestic production, more nuclear energy, more clean coal, and more environmentally friendly sources of en, renewables, as well as conservation. Here's the problem in Washington. You've got these two extremes. On one side they say we don't want any offshore production, no new nuclear reactors, no new refineries. On the other side you have this other extreme saying no conservation and no alternative energies, and that's ridiculous. We need all of that. We haven't built a new reactor in 30 years. There's a reason gas is $4 a gallon.

ANDREW NAPOLITANO: In one of john McCain's recent ads he said the economy is in shambles. How did it get that way?

JINDAL: we've not had a national energy policy for years. We've not increased domestic production; we've not explored these alternative fuels […] Republicans lost the majority in this congress is they didn't do what they said they're going to do. You've seen earmarked spending increase like the bridge to nowhere, you've seen domestic discretionary income increase, and that's hurting the economy.

[…]

STEVE DOOCY: We're talking about Jesse Jackson's unfortunate comments on the live mic here at fox over the weekend. What was he thinking?

JINDAL: Well, you know, obviously the comments are inexcusable whether or not he knew the mic was on or not; he shouldn't have been saying those kinds of things. I also thought it was odd that he would be criticizing Senator Obama for endorsing and embracing the faith-based initiatives started under this administration. I'm a big believer, you can see in New Orleans and Louisiana, the faith -based groups, not for profit, private businesses have done such a better job than the government in helping these people restart their lives. I think that's something both parties should be embracing.

GRETCHEN CARLSON: […] somebody has called you America's most transformational governor. That somebody is Newt Gingrich. Somebody pretty powerful in the Republican Party. Are you the future?

JINDAL: That's very kind for Newt, the speaker, to say that. We've focused on core conservative principles, cut six taxes, revamped the ethics code, it's one of the strongest ethics codes in the country, revamping work force development so our people can get jobs, we guarantee they'll be ready to work, we'll retrain them for free, we've cut government spending, cut the number of government jobs by a thousand. We've been in office for six months. We're doing what we promised the voters we'd do. Which is applying conservative principles. It's not rocket science. Republicans lost the majority in congress because we stopped doing what we told the voters we'd do. In a way the party went native. They went to DC to change DC and instead were changed by DC.

DOOCY: […] I want to ask you about something […], the fisa thing, and even though through the primary he said I'm going to filibuster, I don't like that telecom immunity, yesterday he voted for it, this in a string of flip-flops. We had Rudy Giuliani on, and he said it's because the guy doesn't have a lot of experience, and he's trying to move to the middle. What do you think?

JINDAL: I think it was right to vote for the fisa bill. […] In terms of all the positions on Iran, the gun ban. One of the things that I respect about senator McCain, I don't agree with him on every position, but at least you know where he stands. He sticks with them. Voters are looking for authenticity. I think it's going to be very important for voters to look at both candidates and say who's the one that's going to do what they're saying and stick to their principles. This is going to become an increasingly important differentiation. […]

MCCAIN: I certainly don't want to discuss that issue.

Bob Shrum Discusses Major Problems in the Republican Party for November (MSNBC 07/10/08 07:43am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: Hold on a second, I mean, Colombian rebels in the mountains of Colombia are more unified than the Republican Party right now. So that is a very very low standard.

BOB SHRUM: Look at what he's done! He's doing the opposite of what Nixon said. Nixon said, you run to the right in the primaries, you run to the center in the general. Because he has the nomination in numbers but not in spirit, enthusiasm, and the heart of the Republican Party, he's still running to the right.

SCARBOROUGH: Bob, what's happening right now with the polls? Everything's going badly for the Republicans. John McCain's run an uninspired campaign. As Pat Buchanan brought up, in this stage in 1976, which was a similar environment for republicans, Jimmy Carter was up by what? 30 points? What's happening where Obama's up 2, 3, 4 points? Why's is still so close?

SHRUM: I think it's a lot like the 1980 election. Pat actually wrote a column the other day that suggested this. I haven't seen it yet, but we talked about this, and he's absolutely right. All of the objective indices point toward a big democratic victory. I think it'll all break in the last couple of weeks if it doesn't break before during the debates. But unless Obama makes a big mistake, I think he's going to be president. […]

SCARBOROUGH: Isn't that the key here? The debate? I've said from the beginning of this matchup that Americans are going to decide the first few minutes of the first debate, either Barack Obama is too young and inexperienced to be president, or John McCain is too old and tired to be president.

McCain's Oil Obsession Evident in Local West Virginia News Interview (WOWK-WV 13-ABC 07/09/08 7:39pm)
MARTINA BILLS: […] Talk a little bit about how you plan to win both of these states, I know both of them are a little different, but both are so important.

JOHN MCCAIN: Well, this is a great challenge. Both states are the heartland of America. Coal is a very big asset in both states. I want to invest 2 billion dollars a year in clean coal technology. America sits on the world's largest supply of coal. And that is the key part of our energy future. So we need clean coal technology. And we need to develop it fast. And then we can be independent of foreign oil. I want to keep taxes low, I want to help with education. There's a number of issues. But specifically, West Virginia and Ohio, with their vast deposits of oil, of coal! I keep saying oil. Cause we got to become oil independent. We got to make clean coal technology part of our energy future.

BILLS: And about education, I know one women mentioned it downstairs, no child left behind. It works, but it obviously needs more help.

MCCAIN: Needs to be fixed. We authorized it some years ago, it's time to review it, fix it, and move forward. But choice and competition is still important. And I'd like to say that I still think it's a good thing, that we're able to compare our sixteen year olds performance with that of a sixteen year old junior in high school here in Ohio. So I think there's some good things, but, we need to fix it.

BILLS: The economy, obviously, that was one of your main focuses downstairs today. We have so many, you know, working class here. Working poor as well. Talk a little bit about how your plan can help all those people. Especially the working poor.

MCCAIN: Yeah, we've got to get jobs for them. That's the whole thing, jobs, and jobs, and jobs. We've got to give them a child tax credit that's $7,000 dollars instead of $3,500. We've got to have education and training programs based in our community colleges. That's the strongest part of our education, to get them into jobs. Right now, it's just with some of the coal people in West Virginia, that also are in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio, are these areas where there's a lot of coal. They said they're having trouble finding coal miners to train and work, and do some of the work in the coal mining industry. I want us to have training and education programs to supply those increased workers in coal because there's going to be increased workers. We have to keep taxes low. If you raise taxes, as Senator Obama wants to do, then we are going to harm the economy further. These are tough times, there are better days ahead of us. But these are tough times and we have to have a plan of action for the American people so that they can have a brighter future, which I'm convinced they can.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BILLS: And you did also mention that you will be back in Ohio. Is that the same for West Virginia, and obviously Kentucky, we cover all three so.

MCCAIN: You know, I love Kentucky, and I was in Inez, Kentucky not that long ago. It's also true that it's a great state and I have to campaign there. But I also have to focus a lot of attention on West Virginia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Michigan, these are states that are probably be also swing states. So you can see a lot of me, you're going to see a lot of me in the heartland of America. Riding around on the bus, going to small town, and having a great time.

BILLS: One other thing, you know, West Virginia supported Clinton all the way. And you hear, you know, we don't want Obama, those democrats say, some of them say they'll vote for you. How do you feel about that when you hear that because of what happened with the primaries?

MCCAIN: I need the votes of republicans, independents, and the old and new quote "Reagan democrats". I need their votes. I need that of people who cherish the second amendment. I need those who are working men and women who are having tough times right now, so that I can assure them of a better future. And I will invest 2 billion dollars a year in research and development for clean coal technologies, which part of West Virginia's future is important, as well as in Pennsylvania and Ohio. So, I'll do, I'll work hard, and I'll campaign hard. And I think I can win in West Virginia, but I think it's, I'm the underdog. I got a lot of work to do.

Washington Post: "GOP presidential contenders travel the globe in preparation to take on Clinton"

By Philip Rucker and Anne Gearan

February 1, 2015, 3:35 p.m. EST

LONDON — New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie is here in the United Kingdom, where he said he looks forward to getting reacquainted with Prime Minister David Cameron on Monday. Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal recently returned from a European tour during which he assailed Hillary Rodham Clinton for her "mindless naivete." And next week, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker is due in London for an overseas trip of his own.

Republican presidential hopefuls are busy auditioning on the world stage ahead of the 2016 campaign, trying to bolster their résumés and develop expertise as their party seizes on foreign affairs as a key theme in its effort to reclaim the White House.

GOP leaders and strategists consider foreign policy a weakness of President Obama's tenure and therefore a potential vulnerability for Clinton, the likely Democratic candidate who helped carry out Obama's first-term foreign policy as secretary of state. Many contenders have been attacking Clinton. Before bowing out last week, Mitt Romney called the Obama administration "timid" and accused Clinton of acting "cluelessly."

Yet many of the Republican Party's rising stars — like Romney, its 2012 nominee — are governors with scant international exposure, so they are acting quickly to try to gain credibility.

Enter Christie, whose London visit is his fourth foreign trip as governor, following tours of Canada, Israel and Mexico. Ahead of official meetings that begin here Monday, Christie took in a soccer match Sunday afternoon. As he exited the gleaming Emirates Stadium, bundled up on a frigid afternoon with Arsenal's red-and-white team scarf, Christie said he was excited about nurturing relationships with British officials.

Michael E. O'Hanlon, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, said talking about foreign affairs reveals a presidential candidate's character, communications skills and decision-making style. While domestic issues "concern budgets, detailed lawmaking, cooperation with Congress and technical matters," he said, "foreign affairs are in some ways simpler. It's about how to handle bad guys, how to protect the country, and how to convey confidence and purpose."

Like Christie, most of the other Republican White House hopefuls have articulated hawkish views in line with their party's traditional orthodoxy, though a divergent and more isolationist view has emerged within the party's libertarian wing represented by Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Any Republican candidate would face an unusual challenge in drafting national security platforms in opposition to Clinton. As a senator and 2008 presidential candidate, Clinton developed a record and reputation as a foreign policy hawk that would complicate or head off the traditional GOP argument about Democratic weakness on security issues.

Nearly two years out from the next presidential election, the contenders have yet to present specifics beyond sketching out their worldviews. It also is unclear how much foreign affairs will shape the campaign. If the economy continues to improve, the public's attention could turn beyond the U.S.'s borders. And as always, world events that may not be foreseen, such as a terrorist attack, could set the agenda.

"Foreign policy could end up playing a minimal role on both sides, or it could end up playing a fairly large role, and I think the honest answer is nobody knows at this point," said Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, whom several presidential candidates have consulted.

Regardless, he said, it is important for candidates to "kick some tires around the world." He added: "You don't want to make a mistake which would raise questions about your readiness for the job."

So it is that would-be Republican candidates have been traveling the globe — many of them under the guise of trade missions to promote economic development for their states on trips paid with public funds.

The visits usually include meetings with foreign government and business officials as well as cultural stops. In England, Christie is sitting down with Cameron but also will see a rehearsal of William Shakespeare's "Henry V" at Shakespeare's historic Globe Theatre.

Former Texas governor Rick Perry has traveled overseas repeatedly since his failed 2012 presidential campaign, including visits last year to the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, and to China, Japan and several Eastern European nations.

Israel is a popular spot for many prospective candidates. Indiana Gov. Mike Pence spent Christmas in Jerusalem, where he met with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, while former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee is leading a tour there later this month. For $5,250 a person, guests can join Huckabee for meetings with senior Israeli officials and tours of Holy Land sites, including swimming in the Dead Sea.

Other presidential hopefuls have a more natural footing in such areas. Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), through his service on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, has made many trips abroad and has been at the center of U.S. foreign policy debates, recently over Obama's move to normalize diplomatic relations with Cuba.

Although many Republicans say their party should turn to a governor as its standard-bearer, Rubio argues that his national-security experience in the Senate is a more valuable commodity than an executive background.

"You can't have middle-class prosperity if your national security is threatened," Rubio told reporters in January. "So the next president needs to be someone that has a clear view of what's happening in the world, a clear strategic vision of America's role in it, and a clear tactical plan for how to engage America in global affairs."

It could be difficult for Republicans to cast Clinton as too weak on foreign policy, considering she earned the vocal admiration of many hawkish senators when she served alongside them.

As the county's top diplomat, Clinton carried out an Obama foreign policy that Republicans attacked as overly deliberative, but as a candidate to succeed him, she can show evidence that she would have taken tougher positions.

One example is Syria, where Clinton favored earlier and stronger military help for beleaguered rebels. She also holds a deeply skeptical view of Russian power, and despite the failure of the policy "reset" with Moscow, it will be difficult for Republicans to paint her as naive.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton would have a harder time showing how she would have made different choices in other areas, including in the current struggle to counter Islamic State rebels. Harder still for Clinton may be the lingering taint of the deadly assaults on two U.S. compounds in Benghazi, Libya, in her final months at the State Department.

Clinton has said she bears ultimate responsibility for Benghazi and has called it the greatest regret of her tenure. But she has denied any knowledge of the circumstances leading up to the armed attacks by extremists or any direct role in responding to them.

Multiple investigations have revealed bureaucratic and safety problems but no high-level malfeasance. Still, the deaths of four Americans on her watch is a political vulnerability that undermines Clinton's image as an industrious and efficient executive.

With unrest across the world, Republicans believe foreign policy could be a winning campaign theme.

"Republicans want this to be an issue," said Kori Schake, a fellow at Stanford University's Hoover Institution and an official in George W. Bush's administration. "If Hillary Clinton is a candidate, she will argue she's a steady set of hands — you know, the 3 a.m. phone call — so Republicans will need to be strong on foreign policy."

Wall Street Journal: "Clinton Consults to Define Economic Pitch"

[Subtitle:] Lineup of Experts and Topics Discussed Offer Hints About a Focus on the Middle Class in a Possible Presidential Campaign

Hillary Clinton has been consulting with an array of economists and academics—including liberal Joseph Stiglitz, former Fed chairman Paul Volcker and new faces outside the traditional orbit of Democratic policy experts—as she prepares for a likely presidential campaign that would make sluggish wage growth and middle-class prosperity a central focus.

One of Mrs. Clinton's broader goals is to develop ways to address economic anxiety without sounding like a combative populist or demonizing high-income groups, said a person familiar with her thinking. It isn't clear whether that particular question has come up in the meetings she has been having with various policy experts.

She has been using the meetings to prepare herself for a possible campaign, ground herself in the issues and tease out fresh approaches to stubborn domestic and foreign policy problems, people familiar with the matter said.

As the former secretary of state keeps a low public profile ahead of announcing her near-certain candidacy, the meetings offer clues to which issues she believes merit attention and whose advice she values. Many, but not all, participants served in Bill Clinton 's administration; others are distinguished primarily by expertise in subjects that are certain to be front-and-center in the 2016 presidential race.

Some of the meetings had the feeling of a high-octane faculty symposium and lasted for hours, say people familiar with the sessions. Pen and pad in hand, Mrs. Clinton typically has gone around the room to ask for ideas, offering comments now and then and inviting participants to make suggestions down the road.

In December, Mrs. Clinton presided over a meeting at a midtown Manhattan hotel that focused on middle-class Americans feeling pinched by slow wage growth.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Among those attending: Mr. Volcker, the architect of the “Volcker Rule,” a regulatory measure barring banks from making risky bets with their own money; Jonathan Cowan, co-founder of the centrist think tank Third Way, which has been critical of some of the populist rhetoric coming from the Democrats’ liberal wing; and Alan Blinder , a Princeton professor and former Fed vice chairman and economics adviser to Mr. Clinton.

Also at the meeting, according to people familiar with it, were Robert Hormats, who worked in the State Department during Mrs. Clinton’s tenure and was a former vice chairman of Goldman Sachs; Richard Ravitch , a former Democratic lieutenant governor in New York, who helped New York City avert bankruptcy during a fiscal crisis in the 1970s; and Teresa Ghilarducci, a labor economist and proponent of ideas to shore up Americans’ retirement savings. The Clinton team has asked her to help evaluate various policy ideas.

The participants examined a range of ideas to boost economic security, such as tax cuts for the middle class, expanded access to prekindergarten education and new ways to pay for improvements to roads and tunnels, said people familiar with the session.

“One major focus of the meeting was the miserable recent performance of wages in general and middle-class wages in particular, and what if anything the government can do about that,” said Mr. Blinder.

Bernard Schwartz, a longtime Democratic donor and contributor to the Clinton Foundation, was among those who helped arrange the meeting, said people familiar with the session. Mr. Schwartz is a former chairman of Loral Space & Communications Ltd. Mrs. Clinton also has consulted with Mr. Stiglitz, a former economic adviser to Bill Clinton and author of a book about the perils of economic inequality.

The policy interests of some participants point to the issues Mrs. Clinton is likely to prioritize, notably the financial pressures faced by middle-class families. Prospective Republican presidential candidates also are talking about shoring up the middle class and, in some cases, narrowing the wage gap in America—a sign that those topics will be flashpoints in the general election.

Mrs. Clinton is the overwhelming front-runner for the Democratic nomination, but some liberals would like to see her challenged by U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.), a populist firebrand who has described the American economic system as “rigged” in favor of the wealthy. Ms. Warren has said she won’t run. In targeting income inequality, Mrs. Clinton would address a substantive issue facing the country while also making inroads with Ms. Warren’s liberal followers.

Mrs. Clinton also has held foreign policy meetings in New York and Washington. A New York meeting in the summer was a “tour” of global hot spots, among them the war in Syria and Russia’s incursions into Ukraine, according to people familiar with what took place.

Mrs. Clinton asked for a diagnosis of the problem and a “strategic” view of how the U.S. should act, one person familiar with the meeting said.

Those who attended included Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations, who worked under both Republican presidents George H.W. Bush and George W. Bush; David Rothkopf, author of a new book on foreign policy-making in the George W. Bush and Obama administrations; and Dennis Ross, a diplomat with many years of experience in the Middle East peace negotiations.

More informally, Mrs. Clinton has also spoken to trusted Democratic confidants about appointments to high-level positions in her campaign, should she decide to run.

A campaign apparatus is already taking shape. John Podesta, a senior adviser to President Barack Obama, is likely to become a senior adviser to the campaign, while two Obama campaign veterans, pollster Joel Benenson and media adviser Jim Margolis, are expected to take top positions on Mrs. Clinton’s campaign team, people familiar with the matter said.

“She’s casting a wide net, talking to a wide range of people on a wide range of specific topics” said Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton. “Make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote.”

CNN: "Clinton advisers are split on when Hillary Clinton should launch her campaign"

By Brianna Keilar

February 2, 2015

This time eight years ago, when she first ran for president, Hillary Clinton was already officially a candidate.

"I'm in it to win it," she said in a YouTube video posted on January 21, 2007.

But even though a second Hillary Clinton for president campaign is all but certain, she and those close to her are debating when she should jump in the race, potentially delaying her entry by months.

There is no waiting for Republicans, who are engaged in a furious behind-the-scenes scramble for advisers and donors. Mitt Romney, Republicans' nominee in 2012, announced Friday he would bow out after just three weeks on the presidential speculation treadmill. Three Republican senators, two current governors and one former governor have all made active moves toward campaigns.

There could be ten or more Republican candidates by this summer. That might be when Hillary Clinton gets around to officially moving toward a campaign, if she heeds some confidantes, who are privately arguing for an announcement in July to coincide with the start of the third fundraising quarter. Delaying until the summer is an idea that is said to be gaining momentum against those who want to stick to the plan for an April start date.

The possibility of the delay is very real but still unsettled.

"I would say it's 40 percent," in the direction of those arguing for a delay, said one Democrat who supports a spring debut for Clinton's presidential campaign. Another Democrat who saw merits in both time lines put the odds of a delay at 50 percent.

Democrats on both sides of the debate spoke to CNN on the condition of anonymity so they could make their case without upsetting Clinton or those close to her for talking openly about internal deliberations.

Some Clinton loyalists worry that as the increasingly crowded Republican race heats up, the attacks on her could begin to stick without an apparatus in place to answer them.

The liberal superPAC American Bridge has been countering Republican attacks on Clinton's behalf but many Democrats think it's no substitute for a campaign messaging operation.

"They're doing terrific research," said one, "but they don't know what her specific policy agenda is going to be. She should get in and start putting together a substantive policy agenda so the attacks that are going to begin to come from every single republican who is jumping in to the race can be answered."

The Democratic National Committee is beginning to take on a larger role in an effort to protect Clinton and the party brand but many Democrats are concerned even that won't be enough.

Other supporters want Clinton to lay low as the Republican field heats up, convinced Clinton will avoid some fire if she's undeclared and GOP candidates will take aim at each other instead.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Never interrupt your opponent when it's destroying itself. That event in Iowa - nobody hated that more than [RNC chairman] Reince Priebus," said one Democrat, referring to the recent Iowa Freedom Summit, the first GOP cattle call for prospective candidates of many Republican presidential hopefuls (though noticeably neither Jeb Bush, Mitt Romney nor Rand Paul) attended. "Let's get Sarah Palin out there, let's get Donald Trump out there - the whole clown car."

Some Democrats believe it's also in Clinton's best interest to wait until President Obama, whose approval ratings have begun to rebound, becomes more popular, since a campaign by his former secretary of state will undoubtedly be seen as an extension of his presidency. It's a view shared by many at the White House who eye the entry of Clinton into the 2016 contest as the beginning of Obama's lame duck phase.

But if Clinton waits, could run the risk of looking like she's taking the Democratic nomination for granted.

"The American people don't like to see a candidate assume that something is theirs for the taking," warned one Clinton supporter.

"If [Hillary Clinton] is trying to avoid a coronation it really is a terrible way to go about it. It sends a message that we don't have to campaign in the primaries." said a Democratic operative in Iowa, who warned it leaves an opening. "It really does require another candidate to fill that void"

And so far, no one has.

Vice President Joe Biden, former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley, former Virginia Senator Jim Webb and Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders have all made the trek to Iowa in the last year, but none are being particularly agressive in recruiting staff or taking on Clinton.

"O'Malley hired one staff member the other day and that's all anyone is talking about," said the Iowa operative of the unusually quiet political scene in the early state. "It's kinda weird."

In 2008, Clinton's air of inevitability was off putting to many voters. Clinton and her advisers have been looking to avoid it this time around.

But without an insurgent, Obama-like candidate waiting in the wings (Clinton insiders are now pretty much convinced that populist darling and Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren won't run, despite initial concerns she could mount a serious challenge from the left), many loyalists argue Clinton is safe to wait.

"If she's out there working hard, making her case, speaking to voters, that's what's going to matter," said a Washington-based Clinton backer who thinks a delayed campaign launch could benefit her.

It won't benefit her campaign coffers, however.

"Money will not flow until she's actually running," said one Democrat who cited powerful donor support for a Clinton run but acknowledged, "People don't give that kind of money on speculation."

The numerous Clinton loyalists interviewed for this piece admit there are arguments for both timelines. But perhaps the most important factor in deciding when to jump in the race is Hillary Clinton's personal inclination to put off campaigning.

The last time she ran for president, she entered the race in January 2006, almost two years before the election. The Democratic primary contest turned into a bruising slog that she is not eager to repeat.

"You can't dance in that spotlight for two years," a Clinton loyalist said. "She's not Rand Paul, she's the most famous woman on earth and every move is scrutinized."

New Republic: "Elizabeth Warren Supporters: Hillary Clinton Is 'Republican Lite' and 'Completely Unacceptable'"

By Claire Groden

February 1, 2015

Elizabeth Warren wants you to know that she really isn't planning to run for president. She said so in an interview with NPR's Steve Inskeep last month, when she repeated at least four times, "I am not running for president." She told the same thing to The Washington Post's Ruth Marcus: "I am not running. I think I am being definitive." And when Fortune asked her in January: "No."

Her supporters are not convinced. In a promotional video for Run Warren Run, a group dedicated to getting Warren on the 2016 presidential ballot, the senator is shown being asked the same question—but the scene cuts before she can answer the usual no. This Sunday, just hours before the Super Bowl, more than 20 people trickled into a windowless basement room of Washington, D.C.'s Martin Luther King Jr. Memorial Library. Like more than 200 other meetings that convened across the country through Run Warren Run, the group strategized how to convince the Massachusetts senator to say yes.

"I've heard questions before, like, 'I heard that she's not running,'" one of the organizers, who asked to go only by his first name, Carl, said. "But they all say they're not going to run before they run." For many in the room, it's Warren's hesitance to self-promote that has won her so much respect.

Though the organizers asked participants to avoid trash-talking Clinton, Carl opened the meeting by calling for more than "a coronation" in the Democratic primary. Participants said that the sense of Clinton's inevitability was a threat to the democratic process, and described Clinton as "Republican lite," "in the pocket of big business," and "completely unacceptable." Zephyr Williams, a graduate student at American University, explained her wariness with establishment politicians. "I can imagine it's difficult to avoid selling out when you've been in politics for as long as Hillary has," she said, underlining what many in the group saw as Warren's key strength as an outsider to politics. Others criticized Clinton for her hawkish foreign policy and support amongst Wall Street bankers.

Participants praised Warren as a "fighter" for the middle class, waging war against Wall Street even at the expense of her own party. Many progressives cheered for Warren when she scuttled President Obama's renomination of former Lazard banker Antonio Weiss to a top Treasury Department post. Warren's bill to help students refinance their loans, which was blocked in the Senate in September, also placed her on the radar screens of many young Democrats. Part of the Run Warren Run's strategy is to raise awareness of the senator, since many voters aren't as familiar with Warren as they are with Clinton. "To know Elizabeth Warren is to love her," said one meeting attendee.

So far, polls have shown Clinton far outpacing any other Democratic challengers in the polls, and Politico reported that the frontrunner is considering delaying her campaign, since her campaign sees no serious contender in the ranks. But in September, a WSJ/NBC poll found that only 43 percent of voters viewed Clinton favorably, compared to 41 percent who had negative views. In the Run Warren Run meeting, a retired teacher named Jeanne Castro said that she felt torn between voting for Clinton and Obama in the 2008 presidential primary. Castro wanted to vote for Clinton because she wanted to see a woman in the White House, but "Hillary never moved me," she said. "Warren, she touched me."

In a November poll conducted by the progressive organization Democracy for America, Warren emerged as the favored candidate with 42 percent, beating out Clinton by 19 percentage points. But among those who showed up for the Run Warren Run event, a few said they still expected Clinton to win. Would they vote for Clinton if Warren doesn't run? Tom Hunter, a 59-year-old on long-term disability, chuckled. "Yeah, of course I would vote for Hillary."

New York Times: "U.S. Considers Supplying Arms to Ukraine Forces, Officials Say"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Michael R. Gordon and Eric Schmitt

February 1, 2015

WASHINGTON — With Russian-backed separatists pressing their attacks in Ukraine, NATO's military commander, Gen. Philip M. Breedlove, now supports providing defensive weapons and equipment to Kiev's beleaguered forces, and an array of administration and military officials appear to be edging toward that position, American officials said Sunday.

President Obama has made no decisions on providing such lethal assistance. But after a series of striking reversals that Ukraine's forces have suffered in recent weeks, the Obama administration is taking a fresh look at the question of military aid.

Secretary of State John Kerry, who plans to visit Kiev on Thursday, is open to new discussions about providing lethal assistance, as is Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, officials said. Defense Secretary Chuck Hagel, who is leaving his post soon, backs sending defensive weapons to the Ukrainian forces.

In recent months, Susan E. Rice, Mr. Obama's national security adviser, has resisted proposals to provide lethal assistance, several officials said. But one official who is familiar with her views insisted that Ms. Rice was now prepared to reconsider the issue.

Fearing that the provision of defensive weapons might tempt President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia to raise the stakes, the White House has limited American aid to "non-lethal" items, including body armor, night-vision goggles, first aid kits and engineering equipment.

But the failure of economic sanctions to dissuade Russia from sending heavy weapons and military personnel to eastern Ukraine is pushing the issue of defensive weapons back into discussion.

"Although our focus remains on pursuing a solution through diplomatic means, we are always evaluating other options that will help create space for a negotiated solution to the crisis," said Bernadette Meehan, a spokeswoman for the National Security Council.

Fueling the broader debate over policy is an independent report to be issued Monday by eight former senior American officials, who urge the United States to send $3 billion in defensive arms and equipment to Ukraine, including anti-armor missiles, reconnaissance drones, armored Humvees and radars that can determine the location of enemy rocket and artillery fire.

Michèle A. Flournoy, a former senior Pentagon official who is a leading candidate to serve as defense secretary if Hillary Rodham Clinton is elected president, joined in preparing the report. Others include James G. Stavridis, a retired admiral who served as the top NATO military commander, and Ivo Daalder, the ambassador to NATO during Mr. Obama's first term.

"The West needs to bolster deterrence in Ukraine by raising the risks and costs to Russia of any renewed major offensive," the report says. "That requires providing direct military assistance — in far larger amounts than provided to date and including lethal defensive arms."

In his State of the Union address last month, Mr. Obama noted that the sanctions imposed by the United States and its allies had hurt the Russian economy.

But American officials acknowledge that Russia has repeatedly violated an agreement, reached in Minsk in September. The agreement called for an immediate cease-fire in Ukraine, the removal of foreign forces and the establishment of monitoring arrangements to ensure that the border between Ukraine and Russia would be respected.

In recent weeks, Russia has shipped a large number of heavy weapons to support the separatists' offensive in eastern Ukraine, including T-80 and T-72 tanks, multiple-launch rocket systems, artillery and armored personnel carriers, Western officials say.

Some of the weapons are too sophisticated to be used by hastily trained separatists, a Western official said. NATO officials estimate that about 1,000 Russian military and intelligence personnel are supporting the separatist offensive while Ukrainian officials insist that the number is much higher.

Supported by the Russians, the separatists have captured the airport at Donetsk and are pressing to take Debaltseve, a town that sits aside a critical rail junction.

All told, the separatists have captured 500 square kilometers — about 193 square miles — of additional territory in the past four months, NATO says. The assessment of some senior Western officials is that the Kremlin's goal is to replace the Minsk agreement with an accord that would be more favorable to the Kremlin's interests and would leave the separatists with a more economically viable enclave.

The administration's deliberations were described by a range of senior Pentagon, administration and Western officials, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because they were talking about internal discussions.

A spokesman for General Breedlove declined to comment on his view on providing defensive weapons, which was disclosed by United States officials privy to confidential discussions.

"General Breedlove has repeatedly stated he supports the pursuit of a diplomatic solution as well as considering practical means of support to the government of Ukraine in its struggle against Russian-backed separatists," the spokesman, Capt. Gregory L. Hicks of the Navy, said. But a Pentagon official familiar with the views of General Dempsey and Adm. James A. Winnefeld Jr., the vice chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said they believed the issue of defensive weapons should be reconsidered.

"A comprehensive approach is warranted, and we agree that defensive equipment and weapons should be part of that discussion." the Pentagon official said.

Russian casualties remain an unusually delicate political issue for Mr. Putin, who has denied that Russian troops have been ordered to fight in Ukraine.

The report by Ms. Flournoy and the other former officials argues that the United States and its allies should capitalize on this fact to dissuade the Russians and the separatists from expanding their offensive.

"One of the best ways to deter Russia from supporting the rebels in taking more territory and stepping up the conflict is to increase the cost that the Russians or their surrogates would incur," Ms. Flournoy said in an interview.

The current stock of Ukrainian anti-armor missiles, the report notes, is at least two decades old, and most of them are out of commission. So the report recommends that the United States provide the Ukrainian military with light anti-armor missiles, which might include Javelin antitank missiles.

"Providing the Ukrainians with something that can stop an armored assault and that puts at risk Russian or Russian-backed forces that are in armored vehicles, I think, is the most important aspect of this," she added.

The Obama administration has provided radars that can locate the source of mortars. But the report urges the United States to also provide radars that can pinpoint the location of longer-range rocket and artillery fire. Enemy rocket and artillery attacks account for 70 percent of the Ukrainian military's casualties, the report says.

Ukraine, the report notes, also needs reconnaissance drones, especially since the Ukrainian military has stopped all flights over eastern Ukraine because of the separatists' use of antiaircraft missiles supplied by Russia.

The report also urged the United States to provide military communications equipment that cannot be intercepted by Russian intelligence.

Poland, the Baltic States, Canada and Britain, the report says, might also provide defensive weapons if the United States takes the lead.

The report was issued jointly by the Atlantic Council, the Brookings Institution and the Chicago Council on Global Affairs. The other officials who prepared it are Strobe Talbott, who served as deputy secretary of state in the Clinton administration; Charles F. Wald, a retired Air Force general who served as deputy commander of the United States European Command; Jan M. Lodal, a former Pentagon official; and two former ambassadors to Ukraine, John Herbst and Steven Pifer.

Bloomberg: "Obama's $4 Trillion Budget Sets Up Fight with Congress"

By Jonathan Allen

February 2, 2015, 6:00 a.m. EST

President Barack Obama will send a $4 trillion budget blueprint to Congress today that would raise taxes on corporations and the nation's top earners, fund major investments in infrastructure and education and stabilize, but not eliminate, the annual U.S. budget deficit.

The plan challenges Republicans to make politically thorny choices between defending current tax rates for the wealthy and Obama's proposals to boost spending for the middle class, the Pentagon and companies that build domestic infrastructure.

That's exactly the ground Democrats want to fight on heading into the 2016 elections. Addressing income inequality has become a mantra for Democrats from Obama to 2016 presidential nomination front-runner Hillary Clinton, and some of the Republican contenders have taken up the issue as well.

The budget plan for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1 backs up Obama's recent talk about directing assistance to the middle class with tax breaks and programs for education, job training and child care, administration officials said. Rather than dialing back his goals after Republicans expanded their House majority and took control of the Senate in November's midterm elections, the president is pursuing a more aggressive strategy.

Republicans were out with criticism even before the budget documents arrived at the Capitol.

'Envy Economics'

"What I think the president is trying to do here is to, again, exploit envy economics. This top-down redistribution doesn't work," Representative Paul Ryan of Wisconsin, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, said on NBC's "Meet the Press" on Sunday. "It may make for good politics. It doesn't make for good economic growth."

Congress is under no obligation to follow Obama's budget plan, and most of his major proposals will be ignored by House and Senate Republicans as they form their own blueprint for spending and taxes.

Obama's plans to assist lower- and middle-income taxpayers include underwriting the cost of community college for most students, tripling the child tax credit for families with kids under 5 years old, and creating a $500 "second earner" tax credit for families in which both spouses work. He had more room to do that without adding to the deficit as job creation brings in more tax revenue and the economy keeps expanding.

Democratic Support

"His emphasis is on growing jobs and boosting paychecks, but doing it in a fiscally responsible way," Representative Chris Van Hollen of Maryland,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

the top Democrat on the House Budget Committee, said in an interview Sunday. “He’ll have broad and deep support from Democrats.”

The president’s fiscal plan would result in a 2016 deficit of $474 billion, according to administration officials. The shortfall would represent 2.5 percent of gross domestic product, a level that many economists regard as sustainable, down from a projected 3.2 percent in fiscal 2015. It wouldn’t rise above 2.6 percent of GDP in any year for the next decade under the president’s budget, even as the absolute numbers rise.

Those figures are substantially less that the record $1.4 trillion deficit in 2009, the year Obama took office and the U.S. began pulling out of the worst recession since the Great Depression. The administration projects economic growth for the current year will average 3.1 percent, which is in line with private forecasts.

On the tax front, Obama wants to raise the top rate on capital gains and dividends to 28 percent from 23.8 percent and impose levies on asset transfers at death, closing what the White House calls the “largest capital gains loophole” in the tax code.

Overseas Profits

The president’s plan pits drug and technology companies that keep earnings overseas out of reach of U.S. taxes against firms that build roads, bridges and mass transit systems. He wants to fund $478 billion in infrastructure work over six years in part by applying a 14 percent tax to profits that are parked outside the country.

Obama’s corporate tax plan, which creates a narrow opening to talk about a business tax overhaul with Republicans, includes a 19 percent levy on future foreign earnings for U.S. companies. The administration is no longer insisting that overseas profits be taxed at the 35 percent top U.S. corporate rate.

He’s also setting up a confrontation between Republican defense hawks and spending hawks by offering a $38 billion increase for national security programs over current budget caps in exchange for $37 billion more in discretionary spending for domestic programs. His proposal to relax those spending limits, known as sequestration, would put discretionary spending for fiscal 2016 at $1.091 trillion, which is $74 billion above the limits.

Discretionary Spending

Those discretionary appropriations, both the total amount and the details of how to allocate the money among federal agencies, are what Obama and Congress must agree on to keep the government running past the start of the fiscal year on Oct. 1.

On education, Obama is proposing to make community college free for students who keep their grades up and make progress toward graduation, a plan that’s estimated to cost $60 billion over 10 years.

His budget would also aim at the other end of the educational spectrum, putting an additional $1 billion into Head Start, setting aside $750 million for universal pre-school and expanding access to child care for 1.1 million more children under the age of 4 by 2025, according to a fact sheet released by the White House.

One area that figures to get attention from Congress this year is cybersecurity. In the wake of hacks against banks, Sony and the U.S. postal service, the White House and lawmakers in both parties have been searching for ways to deter attacks, respond to them when they happen, and, in some cases, retaliate.

Obama would spend $14 billion, spread across government agencies, to bolster cybersecurity.

[National Journal: "Proof That the Left Is Ready for a Clinton Presidential Run"]

By Ben Geman

September 6, 2014

At midday Friday I posted a short item about GOP Sen. Rand Paul bashing Hillary Clinton over climate change.

Clinton called climate change "the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges we face." Paul accused Clinton of wanting to battle climate change instead of terrorism.

It was a noteworthy exchange between a pair of potential 2016 contenders, but the disagreement itself is not particularly surprising: Clinton is a longtime proponent of climate action. Paul is a critic of Clinton's and lives on the other side of the partisan divide.

It was what happened next that caught my eye: Shortly after Paul's remarks, a pro-Clinton "rapid response" group called Correct The Record circulated a statement attacking the Kentucky senator. They also emailed me personally to (politely) inquire if I might add it to National Journal's story.

And they weren't alone.

Later in the afternoon, the League of Conservation Voters chimed in with a defense of Clinton's remarks at a green-energy conference Thursdaynight in Nevada, claiming that Paul's response "reflects a profound lack of understanding of how serious a threat" climate change poses.

NextGen Climate, the group backed by billionaire green activist Tom Steyer, also went after Paul for his stance on global warming: "A real threat would come from a science-denier as the leader of the free world."

It remains to be seen whether Clinton will run in 2016—she says she'll decide early next year. But Friday's press flurry demonstrates that environmental groups and others on the left are already circling the wagons behind their potential front-runner. And it's demonstrative of the campaign infrastructure that would be awaiting Clinton the moment she entered the race.

So what did Paul say that set off the green fury?

He attacked Clinton during a Fox News interview about battling the radical Islamist group ISIS, arguing: "For her to be out there saying that the biggest threat to our safety and to our well-being is climate change, I think ... goes to the heart of the matter or whether or not she has the wisdom to lead the country, which I think it's obvious that she doesn't."

That prompted environmentalists to offer reminders of military planners' warnings about the security dimensions of climate change. They said:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Rather than repeating tea-party and Koch Brothers talking points to deny the science of climate change, Senator Paul would be better served reading the Department of Defense's latest Quadrennial review, which recognized that the impacts of climate change like extreme weather, drought, and sea-level rise will act as 'threat multipliers that will aggravate stressors abroad such as poverty, environmental degradation, political instability, and social tensions—conditions that can enable terrorist activity and other forms of violence.' "

NextGen Climate, which is billionaire climate activist Tom Steyer's group, also made the military link in a statement titled "Science-Denier-In-Chief Rand Paul Thinks He Knows Better Than the Military."

"Rand Paul, listen to the four-star generals: 16 retired three- and four-star generals and admirals issued a report and identified climate change as a 'catalyst for conflict,' " the group said in a statement.

National Journal: "Hillary Clinton and Rand Paul Just Kicked Off 2016's Climate Battle"

By Ben Geman, Jason Plautz, and Clare Foran

September 5, 2014

HILLARY CLINTON AND RAND PAUL JUST KICKED OFF 2016'S CLIMATE BATTLE. Sen. Rand Paul is attacking Hillary Clinton's Thursday night comments on climate change in what may be a preview of battles during the 2016 presidential-election cycle. Paul on Friday bashed Clinton's claims about the gravity of the threat of climate change, arguing that she's giving too little weight to terrorism. "I don't think we really want a commander in chief who's battling climate change instead of terrorism," Paul, a Kentucky Republican weighing a White House bid, said in a Fox News appearance. Clinton, speaking at a green-energy conference in Nevada, said, "Climate change is the most consequential, urgent, sweeping collection of challenges we face." (Ben Geman, National Journal)

CLINTON ALLIES PUSH BACK AGAINST RAND PAUL'S CLIMATE SLAM. The pro-Hillary Clinton group Correct The Record is knocking Sen. Rand Paul for knocking Clinton's comments about climate change (see above). "For Rand Paul to dismiss climate change as a national priority is shameful, and is in stark contrast to Hillary Clinton, whose leadership on so many issues, including climate change and fighting terrorism, is critical for our future," said Adrienne Watson of Correct The Record, which is an arm of the Democratic super PAC American Bridge. The League of Conservation Voters also circulated a statement criticizing Paul. The 2016 battle over climate policy is underway.

FLASHBACK. In her Las Vegas speech, Clinton didn't delve into many specific policies or touch on any controversial topics, although she did back natural-gas drilling as long as the right safeguards are in place. (Jason Plautz, National Journal)

GREEN GROUPS REALIZE THEY GET WHAT THEY PAY FOR. The Washington Post reports that environmental groups are sharply increasing the amount of cash they're pouring into elections. "Environmentalists' deeper involvement in both state and federal campaigns represents, to a large extent, a recognition that legislation curbing greenhouse-gas emissions on a broad scale will remain out of reach for years without a major political shift in Washington and state capitals," the newspaper reports. (Juliet Eilperin, Washington Post)

OZONE POLLUTION WIPED OUT FOOD FOR 94 MILLION—STUDY. Ozone pollution in India damaged enough good crops to cost the country more than a billion dollars and supplies that could have fed tens of millions of impoverished people, according to researchers at the University of California (San Diego)'s Scripps Institution of Oceanography. The study looked at the impact of surface-level ozone pollution in 2005 and found that it damaged 6.7 million U.S. tons of wheat, rice, soybeans, and cotton crops, enough to feed about a third of the country's poor. JEWELL: 'SURPRISING' WASHINGTON FOOTBALL TEAM HASN'T CHANGED NAME. Interior Secretary Sally Jewell said it was "surprising" that the Washington Redskins hadn't changed their controversial name, but that it wasn't an issue that tribal leaders had raised with her. "[I]n talking with tribal leaders, this has not been the issue that they have talked about with me, and I think that there is debate, even among the Native American community, on the Washington Redskins, and certainly there are a lot of people who have pride in that team," she said in an interview with ABC News.

Media Matters for America: "Fox News Provides Rand Paul A Platform To Fabricate Quotes From Hillary Clinton"

By Alexandrea Boguhn

September 5, 2014, 6:17 p.m. EDT

Fox News offered Sen. Rand Paul (R-KY) a platform to attack former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton over the terrorist group known as the Islamic State, raising questions about the network's willingness to be manipulated using unverified quotes in order to harm a potential presidential candidate.

During the September 3 edition of Hannity, Paul joined host Sean Hannity to discuss the threat of the Islamic State to the U.S. After Hannity asked him if IS "has declared war on us," Paul blamed Clinton for the Islamic State's rise, asserting that "in the past, you know, Hillary Clinton has said ISIS is not a threat to the United States."

Fox's Bill Hemmer later hosted Paul on the September 5 edition of America's Newsroom, where Paul again claimed Clinton has "been out there saying that ISIS is not a threat, and so not a threat to America. Those I think were her exact words." After Hemmer asked Paul whether Clinton actually said the terror group was not a threat, Paul was unable to pin down where the alleged quote was from, but responded that it was his "belief" that "a couple of months ago there was a quote saying ISIS was not a threat to America." Hemmer subsequently failed to follow up on Paul's lack of specifics.

Hemmer's question was a critical one for any journalist to ask, but his failure to demand the specific quote and Hannity's total acceptance of Paul's claim is troubling. By not pushing for proof of Paul's claim, Fox News is letting itself be used as a conduit for misinformation from one potential presidential candidate to another.

New York Review of Books: Joseph Lelyveld: "Hillary"

By Joseph Lelyveld, executive editor of the New York Times, 1994-2001

September 25, 2014

The memoirs of Hillary Clinton have to be viewed, like their author, as a work in progress. Volume one carried her all the way from her days as a Goldwater girl in Park Ridge, Illinois, to her years as a political lightning rod in the Clinton White House, then finally to the United States Senate, which was never going to be her last stop.* Volume two, picking up the story at the end of her 2008 presidential campaign, recounts her four years at the State Department as what she accurately enough but a tad vaingloriously calls "the chief diplomat of the most powerful nation on earth."

Taken together, the two volumes add up to nearly 1,200 pages, and a third can hardly be ruled out. Passages toward the end of the latest, on building the middle class at home and abroad and restoring the American dream for the twenty-first century, read like early drafts for an acceptance speech at the next Democratic convention. Just possibly, by the time that third volume is written, the first African-American president will have long since given way to the first woman to hold the office; and Hillary and Bill will have spent more time in the White House than Eleanor and Franklin.

If it comes to that, Hard Choices won't be the reason. The book landed with a thud. It's a stiff-jointed, careful performance, assembled by a "book team" of former and present aides from briefing papers, old speeches, town hall transcripts, and interviews. What we get are the highly edited reflections of a prospective candidate: part résumé, designed to reveal the depth of her immersion in global affairs and the extent of her familiarity with the world's great and near great, scores of them (from the Empress of Japan to His All Holiness, the Ecumenical Patriarch of the Greek Orthodox Church, to Bono); part rampart, designed not to reveal too much.

Here and there, maybe every eighty pages, it's flecked with stabs at wry humor, mostly about her wardrobe and hair. ("How many times, as Senator from New York, did I go on David Letterman's show to deliver a pantsuit joke?" she asks.) Here and there also, flashes of real feeling briefly light up dry recitals of yet another trip, another itinerary. "That drove me crazy," Clinton exclaims over her discovery that there were no schools in a vast Congolese refugee camp she visited. A "senior administration official" invites a blast from the secretary by posing a question about the wound that could be inflicted on Pakistan's sense of national honor by a raid on Osama bin Laden's presumed hideout. "What about our national honor?" the exasperated Clinton shoots back. The senior official—unnamed, of course—is left to absorb this notice that there may not be a place for him (or her) in the next Clinton administration.

This edgy, tough Hillary often stays home in Hard Choices. Her other persona, the exceptionally diligent chief diplomat, escorts us on a literal tour d'horizon through many of the 112 nations she visited while foreign policy was largely being shaped in the White House by the man who defeated her. Republican campaign hirelings engaged in what's called opposition research are likely to read these pages more avidly than casual Clinton adherents who may have difficulty getting past clunky, cursory accounts of how she pulled off a thaw in relations with New Zealand or spoke up for democracy in Kyrgyzstan, Mongolia, and Kosovo. The book has few revelations, let alone pleasures. Its gazetteer notes compete with one another for lameness. (The Sinai is "famous for its role in the Bible." Lahore is "full of fantastic Mogul architecture." Copenhagen is "a picturesque city, full of cobblestoned streets.")

Still, there's more here than impressions gathered from a motorcade. This installment of Clinton's memoirs is strewn with clues to the way the odds-makers' favorite for next president thinks about the world and our place in it. Fond as she is of proclaiming "new eras" and "new beginnings," little in her approach reflects new thinking.

Having it both ways, she describes herself as neither an idealist nor a realist in foreign policy but an "idealistic realist," which is to say a "hybrid" (her word). On the evidence here, Hillary Clinton belongs to the Yes…but school on foreign policy whose basic premise boils down to this: Yes, our interventions in other countries don't always or often work out the way we mean them to, but we have to get involved, have to uphold the leadership role history has assigned us, for we are the "indispensable nation." That self-glorifying slogan, usually attributed to Madeleine Albright, Bill Clinton's second secretary of state, rolls easily off her lips: "Everything that I have done and seen has convinced me that America remains the 'indispensable nation.'" No opponent will ever get away with accusing her of not embracing the doctrine of American exceptionalism, a civil religion to which every recent president, including Barack Obama, has had to pay homage.

On a swing through North Africa, confronted by a question from a Tunisian lawyer who asks whether she understands why her country is so mistrusted by young people aspiring to democracy, given its compromises with corrupt autocrats who abuse human rights, Clinton gives the Yes…but response. “Yes,” it’s true, she concedes, “We’ve made a lot of mistakes. But I think if you look at the entire historical record, the entire historical record shows we’ve been on the side of freedom, we’ve been on the side of human rights.”

Not to the Tunisian lawyer but in an aside to her readers, almost as if she’s letting them in on a secret, she also says: “America will always do what it takes to keep our people safe and advance our core interests. Sometimes that means working with partners with whom we have deep disagreements.” It’s a proposition she illustrates by conceding that American values were bent in our dependence on the then president of Yemen, Ali Abdullah Saleh: “He was corrupt and autocratic, but he was also committed to fighting al Qaeda and keeping his fractious country together.” He’s our man in Sanaa, at least until we drop him.

She writes of “actual, real-world trade-offs” and acknowledges: “There are always choices we regret, consequences we do not foresee, and alternate paths we wish we had taken.” For instance, in Iran (“a classic Cold War move,” she calls the 1953 coup there), Indochina (Laos paid “a terrible price”), Chile (“a dark chapter”), and Iraq. She ticks off each as blemishes on our sterling record but doesn’t see a pattern. Her hardheaded credo boils down to this: “Making policy is a balancing act. Hopefully we get it more right than wrong.”

The hard choice she regrets most keenly is her vote in the Senate in 2002 authorizing President Bush to use military force in Iraq. She says she took too long to acknowledge that it was a mistake, held out too long “against using the word mistake” during the 2008 primary season. Indirectly, she attributes her defeat to that vote, referring to Obama as “a President who had been elected in part because of his opposition to the war in Iraq and his pledge to end it.”

She also writes about her 2007 vote against the “surge” in Iraq that Bush promoted on the advice of General David Petraeus. But we have to turn to Duty, the recent memoir by former Defense Secretary Robert Gates, who isn’t running for anything, to find her admission to Obama that the vote had more to do with her need not to be wrong-footed by him in the Iowa caucuses than her real thoughts about Iraq. Politics aside, it seems, she could have supported it. Gates then has the president indicating “vaguely” that the same could have been true of him. As a peace candidate, Gates infers, Obama couldn’t support a strategy for war.

A cold warrior of the old school who spent most of his career in the CIA, Gates harrumphs: “To hear the two of them making these admissions, and in front of me, was as surprising as it was dismaying.” As a moment of truth viewed in retrospect with a measure of candor, it might also be called refreshing.

An earnest-sounding Clinton leads us to believe her conclusions about hard choices have been hard-won. When choices on war and peace are made at the highest level, she writes, it’s necessary to search for “the unintended consequences of every decision.” She says she vowed to do this “with more experience, wisdom, skepticism, and humility.” How this vow played out in strategy sessions in the White House situation room, when she was consulted on major decisions, tells a lot about her instincts and what they say, or imply, about any differences she may have had with the instinctively prudent Barack Obama. By the standards of recent American statecraft, he’s more unconventional, more inclined for better or worse to question the predictable options and the supposedly tried-and-true assumptions behind them.

Faced with a thorny choice—on Afghanistan, Iran, Syria, Libya—her own instinct is usually to act in furtherance of America’s “global leadership” role, not abstain. On Afghanistan, for instance, she supports Obama’s 2009 decision to send in a “surge” of 30,000 more troops but wishes he hadn’t capped the number so firmly or publicly committed himself to their withdrawal by the end of this year. But when the Arab Spring sweeps into Cairo’s Tahir Square she’s understandably confounded. It’s Yes…but time again. Mubarak may have been “a heavy-handed autocrat who presided over a corrupt and calcified regime,” but he was “a longtime partner” who “supported peace and cooperation with Israel and hunted terrorists.” Here she advances the best (at least, the normative) thinking of State Department professionals who worry about “other partners” (synonymous with other autocrats) who might “lose trust and confidence in their relationships with us” if we pushed this “key strategic ally” out.

The argument is “unpopular in some quarters of the White House.” This is Clinton’s recurrent narrative trope for a situation in which she finds herself out of sync with the president. In such circumstances, his residence is more likely to be named than he is. Over time, as she explains it, he has evolved in her mind from opponent to partner to the even more exalted rank of personal friend. Of course, he’s also president. She not only writes of their “shared agenda,” but touchingly describes “a lovely, quiet moment” shared in a Cairo mosque, followed by similar stolen moments in a Buddhist temple in Bangkok and the Shwedagon pagoda in Yangon. So comfortable have they become in one another’s company that he doesn’t hesitate to nudge her aside at an international summit to whisper, “You’ve got something in your teeth.”

Strains with the disembodied “White House” are frequently ascribed to “younger White House aides” who are invariably nameless. The president is “swayed” when they appeal to his “idealism,” according to the self-described “idealistic realist” who has—at least in this retrospective, inevitably self-serving rendition—a more nuanced view of the forces at work, of the staying power of the pro-democracy demonstrators; still, Obama calls on Mubarak to step down.

When a retired former ambassador to Egypt voices an apparently dissenting view about Mubarak after visiting him on behalf of Clinton, Obama phones his secretary of state to complain about “mixed messages.” Clinton explains: “That’s a diplomatic way of saying he took me to the woodshed.”

A longer-lasting, more serious strain was over the role of Richard Holbrooke, Clinton’s choice to oversee diplomatic strategy and tactics in the conflict- ridden region known in State Department jargon as Af-Pak. The freewheeling Holbrooke, credited with ending the war in Bosnia in 1995, never succeeded in getting on the same wavelength as the president (and vice versa). The harder he pushed, the more he tried Obama’s patience. Soon the source of power known as the White House was finding ways to trim his mandate and circumvent him. Increasingly unveiled messages were sent to Clinton to ditch him. She went to Obama to save Holbrooke’s job but it’s not clear in this retelling how forcefully she supported the game plan he was seeking to advance, or indeed what the game plan was beyond drawing the Taliban into a negotiation and sponsoring some kind of détente between the Pakistani military and the government in Kabul.

President Hamid Karzai was convinced that Holbrooke was scheming to undermine him, she says. Clinton considered Karzai “a linchpin of our mission in Afghanistan.” She doesn’t say her chief representative agreed. They didn’t agree on everything. She thought more troops were needed; he didn’t. One time in Pakistan, she tells us, this self-propelled “force of nature” pursued the secretary of state into a ladies’ restroom to continue making a point.

The standoff over the envoy’s role ended in December 2011 with his collapse in Clinton’s office with a torn aorta and death two days later. Our author doesn’t say what thoughts ran through her mind as she listened to Obama’s somewhat wooden, not much more than adequate eulogy at the memorial service in the National Cathedral.

Built to thwart opposition researchers scrounging for vulnerabilities, Hard Choices has more pages on Libya than China, including a whole chapter on Benghazi and the 2012 attack there on the US consulate in which Ambassador Chris Stevens and three other Americans died. House Republicans and Fox News have kept up a clamor on Benghazi ever since in hopes of wounding a presumptive nominee with no discernable challenger in the ranks of her own party. A feisty Clinton shows in these pages that she’s ready for them.

In October 2011, she landed in Tripoli and declared, “I am proud to stand here on the soil of a free Libya.” It was a typical Hillary moment. “Proud” is a favorite word, used to congratulate her audience as well as herself, to bask in a sense of shared accomplishment. But now that Libya has descended into anarchy, with the militias that arose with Western (and Arab) backing to oust Muammar Qaddafi carrying on as local mafias and fighting among themselves, how are we to weigh that accomplishment, that pride? Is this unraveling any business of the United States and its allies? Having intervened once to prevent what was branded a “humanitarian catastrophe,” do we have any residual interest or responsibility there, let alone in Afghanistan or Iraq where, as it happens, we’ve decided we have a new “humanitarian catastrophe” on our hands? So severe was this latest crisis, brought on by the rise of ISIS, that US aircraft had to be sent in for the first time in more than two years to halt the jihadist advance, raising the question: How many times, in how many places, can we reintervene?

From where we now sit, Clinton’s day in Tripoli seems faintly reminiscent of George W. Bush’s “Mission Accomplished” show on a carrier flight deck. More recently, Clinton was off on her book tour when, taking no chances, the snake-bitten State Department transferred its Libya personnel to a temporary station in Tunisia. “When America is absent, extremism takes root,” she warns in her Benghazi chapter. Retreat, she asserts, is “just not in our country’s DNA.” So what would she do now? The best wisdom we can draw from these pages is the self-evident observation that Libya might face “very difficult challenges translating the hopes of a revolution into a free, secure, and prosperous future.” It seems a fair translation to say that that amounts, in present circumstances, to “Good luck, Libya.”

President Obama, more willing to focus on bad results, to try to draw lessons from them, recently told Thomas Friedman in an interview that the time to move on is emphatically not the moment “when everybody is feeling good and everybody is holding up posters saying, ‘Thank you, America.’” That’s when “there has to be a much more aggressive effort to rebuild societies that didn’t have any civic traditions.” The United States and its allies “under-estimated” what would be needed in Libya, he said.

At this point, the discussion threatens to turn circular. Isn’t it possible, even likely, that we wouldn’t have intervened at all if we’d allowed ourselves a more realistic estimate, understood from the start that intervening to the extent we did meant taking on the burden of trying to rebuild a ferociously divided Libya? Wasn’t that one of the many lessons of Iraq?

“Challenges” is another favorite Clinton word. And they are everywhere demanding a response, none more so than Syria. In these pages, she’s respectful of Obama’s deliberative approach but eagerly backs a plan drawn up by David Petraeus, by then heading the CIA, for arming and training certifiably “moderate” Syrian rebels. A cautious Obama asks for “examples of instances when the United States had backed an insurgency that could be considered a success.” No one, it seems, has a ready answer. The idea of success has to be redefined. It’s not to overthrow Bashar al-Assad, Obama is told; it’s to take the initiative away from Qatar and Saudia Arabia, which are “dumping weapons into the country,” in order to have “a partner on the ground we could work with.” It was, Clinton writes, “the least bad option among many even worse alternatives.” Leon Panetta, Gates’s successor at the Pentagon, is on her side. “He knew from his own time leading the CIA what our intelligence operatives could do.”

“Some in the White House” are skeptical. They doubt that a credible “moderate” force can be created. It may not be irrelevant that Obama was in the midst of his reelection campaign. In any case, he wasn’t persuaded. “He had promised me,” she writes, “that I would always get a fair hearing. And I always did. In this case, my position did not prevail.”

In her memoir, she presents the choice as a close call, one on which reasonable people could differ. Now, with the launch of her second run for the presidency presumably drawing near and Obama’s poll numbers in the dumps, she views it as having been a no-brainer. “The failure to build up a credible fighting force,” she recently told Jeffrey Goldberg of The Atlantic, left “a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled.” The “least bad option” was always the obvious one to grasp. The former secretary speaks again in the voice of the senator who was proud to serve on the Armed Service Committee, who cultivated top generals, showing that a woman commander in chief could be trusted to command.

She thus aligns herself, at least in one interview, with the commentators for whom Obama’s decision to reject “the least bad option” on Syria stood as proof of his weakness, America’s decline. Now that we see ISIS fighting in Iraq with American weapons seized in armories abandoned by forces we trained, the argument has become muddled. Possibly it takes more strength for a president to reject military intervention when the national security establishment lines up behind it than to give the order everyone is expecting. What seems pretty clear is that Hillary Clinton, experienced and knowledgeable as she now is, wouldn’t be such a president. Like Panetta, she knows what our intelligence operatives can do.
